'It's unbelievable. You don't find that anymore.'

Catching that old-time spirit

Andy Zides has a regimen of oils and balms to restore leather. On tough jobs, he heads to Mike's Shoe Repair in Mattapan.

Andy Zides knows the look these old hunks of beat-up leather can spark.

Without sounding too sepia-toned, it's usually a mix of wonder and joy. A slice of childhood revisited maybe, or a flash of nostalgia for what once was.

The baseball mitts Zides, 46, of Roslindale, collects are many decades old, typically hailing from the first half of the 20th century. And they look it.

"Like an artifact you can put on your hand," he said.

The size of his glove collection varies, in large part because he gives pretty much all of them away. Sometimes, he has as many as 30 or as few as 10. (He's been doing this since he was a teenager.) He has fostered connections throughout professional baseball and he gives the mitts to big leaguers, yes, but also to friends and to kids who play Little League. It's easy for professional athletes in particular, he said, to get nerdy about the gear of their trade.

A fan of the game brings new life to baseball gloves of the distant past — and joy to the recipients of his labor of love

Zides may start selling the mitts, he said, but for now it is purely a labor of love. He does it to see the look on people's faces when they encounter this historic thing from a bygone era.

"I love giving them to people who love baseball," he said.

Compared to modern gloves, this gear resembles a cartoon version of a baseball mitt. It would look more at home on the paw of Homer Simpson than, say, Roman Anthony. The design is more simplistic, the webbing is old-timey, and the palm looks pillowy, for lack of a better term. They are all some shade of brown. Think func-

More urged to be tested for prostate cancer

Updated PSA guidelines call for blood work every 2 years for men 50 to 69

By Allyson Chiu

In its first updated screening guidelines in more than a decade, the American Cancer Society said Thursday that men between the ages of 50 and 69 should get a common blood test for prostate cancer every two years.

For men who are at high risk, including Black men and people with a strong family history of the disease, the organization recommended more rigorous screening: annual blood tests starting at age 45.

Previously, the cancer society recommended that men begin discussions about screening with their doctors at certain ages depending on their risk. It did not directly recommend the blood test, known as a prostate-specific antigen, or PSA, test.

The change "highlights the value of early detection of prostate cancer and in treating men at an earlier stage," said Dr. Adam Feldman, chief of the division of urologic oncology at the Mass General Brigham Cancer Institute, who was not involved in the guidance.

Ex-rowing coach was investigated by police in 2009

Fired by Cape club after reports on trip to S. Africa

A former Cape Cod rowing coach who was charged last week with child rape was fired from a local club and investigated by police nearly two decades ago after allegations of misconduct surfaced, the Globe has learned.

Guy Monseair was let go by Cape Cod Rowing Inc. in 2009 after he led a group of girls on a rowing trip to South Africa, said Peter Smith, the president of the club at the time. Smith said Monseair admitted he had supplied the teenage rowers with alcohol and had them sit on his lap while he was driving.

Rowers also shared stories with their parents about incidents during the trip that were more sexual in nature, Smith said. He declined to share those details with the Globe, saying he wanted to protect victims' privacy. But he said a group of parents was concerned enough about the content of the stories that they contacted police.

With more time, Legislature isn't getting more done

By Anjali Huynh and Chris Van Buskirk

Last year, Massachusetts lawmakers changed their self-imposed deadlines to pass major bills, saying they wanted to avoid the usual pileup that every other July forced them into late-night lawmaking and, critics said, bred dysfunction.

But now, that pileup has simply migrated later into the year.

With about eight weeks until the sun sets on their current term, legislators have a lot of work left, including more than a dozen pieces of major legislation. There are obstacles on the calendar, including holidays and lawmakers' personal schedules; some, for example, are in the United Kingdom this week. And given the closed-door nature of legislative discussions, advocates, stakeholders, and the public have been left to speculate over why previously celebrated priorities have been languishing for

Some rancor remains as BSO looks ahead

Nelsons still has his supporters amid speculation on replacement

Eight months after the Boston Symphony Orchestra declined to renew conductor Andris Nelsons' contract, the search for his successor has yet to officially begin.

That's not unusual. The process of choosing a new music director — especially for an orchestra as storied as the BSO — can be exceedingly deliberate, involving interviews and auditions with conductors from around the world.

But it's also true that the search comes at an unsettled time in the renowned ensemble's 145-year history, as a strident minority of BSO musicians, some patrons, and at least one trustee emeritus continue to call for the Nelsons decision to be overturned.

"I'm not interested in surrendering this institution, and I have a lot of fight and a lot of energy," BSO violist Kathryn Sievers said during an appearance this week on GBH's "Boston Public Radio." "I'm here to raise the alarm because our board is operating without consent."

The BSO's leadership, meanwhile, is focused on the future. In an interview with the Globe, orchestra president and CEO Chad Smith said he and the board of trustees are committed to working with musicians to find the most tal-
