

With shutdown on, war of words heats up

Democrats make their stand on protecting health care

By Sam Brodey
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — When Democrats began drawing their battle lines against Republicans over an impending government shutdown, it was perhaps inevitable that they would center their fight on the cause that fueled their comeback the last time Donald Trump was president: health care.

In 2017, Democrats successfully harnessed public backlash to block Republicans' repeated attempts to repeal the Affordable Care Act. And in the 2018 congressional midterms, they made the GOP pay for proposing those plans, running a health-care-focused effort that netted 40 seats in the House.

Now, with Trump and Republicans back in charge, Democrats are refusing to approve a GOP bill to fund the government, which shut down Wednesday, without major concessions on health care — chief among them extending subsidized tax credits for ACA premiums that are set to expire at the end of the year, affecting roughly 20 million people.

Still struggling to find their

ACA, Page A7

BRENDAN SMIALOWSKI/AFP VIA GETTY IMAGES

A member of the National Guard patrolled at the Lincoln Memorial, which remained open Wednesday.

A bad day to be a tourist
Visitors to Boston-area historical sites and attractions were greeted by signs reading 'closed.' B1.

Parties point fingers, but no talks

By Jim Puzzanghera and Tal Kopan
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — As the first day of the federal government shutdown dawned Wednesday, top Republicans and Democrats seemed to be talking to everyone but each other as they dug in for what could be a long fight.

They blanketed morning TV. They held dueling news conferences. And senators delivered their talking points to throngs of reporters peppering them with questions in the Capitol hallways.

But when the question was how will the shutdown end, the answer was unequivocally: Ask the other side.

“The time for staged photo-

ops, selfies, and scripted talking points is over,” Minnesota Representative Tom Emmer, the third-ranking House Republican, said in the bright sunshine with the Washington Monument as a backdrop at a GOP leadership press conference. “The time for deliberate action is now.”

But there was no such action Wednesday because of a fundamental problem. Republicans say they'll negotiate once the Democrats agree to reopen the government; Democrats say they'll reopen the government once Republicans agree to negotiate.

“Here's what we hope: Now that the Republicans have seen they don't have the votes . . . they

SHUTDOWN, Page A7

‘We must find funding sources beyond gas and electric ratepayers for these programs to really serve everyone.’

AMY BOYD RABIN,
vice president of policy at the Environmental League of Massachusetts

Mass Save forced to temper its ambitions

By Sabrina Shankman
GLOBE STAFF

Early this year, the state's nation-leading energy efficiency program adopted a broader strategy to encourage more low-income households and tenants to tap into its benefits for heat pumps, insulation, and other measures that would save them money while helping the environment.

The intent was to make up for years of not reaching those populations — a failure highlighted this week in a new report by the state auditor's office, which found that low-income residents are paying more for Mass Save through surcharges on their energy bills but not getting much in return.

Yet the response from those customers has so far proved so popular that Mass Save is quickly reaching it budgeted amounts for the cycle and now has to temper ambitions. It is also colliding with another reality: the state is under pressure to keep already high energy bills in check, especially after the budget-busting charges of last winter. And the first thing they targeted for cost-savings was the surcharges on energy bills that underwrite the efficiency measures that Mass Save wants more people to take.

The Mass Save program is designed not just to help homeowners and renters lower their utility bills through energy efficiency, but also to be a critical component of the state's efforts to achieve its legally mandated targets to tackle climate change by reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

Mass Save operates on three-year cycles, and a $5 billion bud-

MASS SAVE, Page A10

SOX LOSE THEIR EDGE

DANIELLE PARHIZKARAN/GLOBE STAFF

Trevor Story had a big night for the Red Sox with a homer and three RBIs, but it wasn't enough as the Sox blew their chance to finish off the Yankees with a 4-3 loss in Game 2 of the wild-card round. Sox starter Brayan Bello didn't last long and was yanked in the third inning, leaving the bullpen to cover the rest of the game. The decisive Game 3, with the winner moving on, will be tonight at 6 or 8. C1.

JANE GOODALL 1934-2025

Seeing chimps for what they really are

JEAN-MARC BOUJU/ASSOCIATED PRESS/FILE 1997

Jane Goodall worked to publicize the plight of dwindling chimpanzee populations.

By Emma Brown
WASHINGTON POST

Jane Goodall had no scientific training, not even a college degree when, at 23, she saved up money to visit a friend in Kenya. She was a London secretary and sometimes waitress with a restless spirit and romantic fixation on animals and Africa based mostly on the “Doctor Dolittle” and “Tarzan” novels of her childhood.

An encounter in Nairobi with the eminent paleoanthropologist Louis Leakey altered the course of her life, setting her on an unlikely path to becoming the world's foremost primatologist. Her startling observations about chimpanzee behaviors — from making tools to making war — revolutionized not only scientific understanding of the capabilities and inner lives of our simian cousins, but also long-held notions about what it means to be human.

Dr. Goodall, whose research prompted a transformation in the ways scientists study social behavior across species, has died at 91. Her death was announced Wednesday by the Jane Goodall Institute, which said she was in California for a speaking tour.

GOODALL, Page C9

Lodging prices on rise as P-town struggles to retain its charm

By Sarah Rahal
GLOBE STAFF

PROVINCETOWN — On a summer afternoon, Commercial Street is humming with tourists, the briny air smelling of fresh fudge and fried clams. Drag queens in sequin dresses sashay past strollers and leashed dogs, weaving through the slow crawl of cars that yield to the crowd of pedestrians and cyclists.

For many, a trip to this destination on the tip of Cape Cod begins when they step off the ferry and check into one of the town's boutique, owner-run inns where innkeepers greet guests by name and cook them breakfast.

For Josh Scaturro and Stan Cottner, running an inn isn't just a job — it's a way of life. The couple recall drunkenly stumbling out of the Boat Slip Resort and Beach Club in 2014, spotting a building for sale, and, within a few months, leaving their lives in Key West, Fla., to launch the Queen Vic Guest House — a 10-room inn where they also live.

They keep operations lean: Cottner handles reservations and cooks breakfast, while Scaturro takes care of laundry and gardening. “It's just Josh and me. It's a lifestyle,” Cottner said. “I get why it's hard if you have to pay a manager, but too often places cut corners — offering a $5 coffee voucher and calling it breakfast. You can't

PROVINCETOWN, Page A10

On the up and up

Thursday: Sunny, brisk. High 59-64. Low 46-51.
Friday: Warming up. High 71-76. Low 52-57.
High tide: 7:50 a.m., 8 p.m.
Sunrise: 6:42 Sunset: 6:24
Weather and Comics, D5-6.

A dozen states, including four in New England, sued Homeland Security Secretary Kristi Noem over funding reductions by the Trump administration. B1.

Coffee drinkers have gotten a rude shock from the closing of a number of Starbucks stores in the Boston area. D1.

Authorities in Swampscott exhumed

the body of a 15-year-old boy who was beaten to death five decades ago. B1.

The Pentagon plans to impose nondisclosure agreements and polygraph testing for people in its headquarters. A2.

The huge influx of Palestinians into the south has further strained humanitarian services, aid groups say. A3.