Court allows Trump to strip legal protections

Order potentially exposes 350,000 Venezuelans to deportation

By Mark Sherman

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court allowed the Trump administration on Monday to strip legal protections from 350,000 Venezuelans, potentially exposing them to deportation.

The court's order, with only one noted dissent by Justice Ketanji

Brown Jackson, puts on hold a ruling from a federal judge in San Francisco that kept in place "temporary protected status" for the Venezuelans that would have otherwise expired last month. The justices provided no rationale, which is common in emergency appeals.

The status, enacted by Congress in 1990, allows people already in the United States to live and work legally because their native countries are deemed unsafe for return because of natural disaster or civil strife.

A federal appeals court had earlier rejected the administration's request to put the order on hold while the lawsuit continues.

The case is the latest in a string of emergency appeals that President Donald Trump's administration has made to the Supreme Court, many of them related to immigration.

Last week, the government asked the court to allow it to end humanitarian parole for hundreds of thousands of immigrants from Cuba, Haiti, Nicaragua and Venezuela, setting them up for potential deportation as well.

The high court also has been involved in legal battles over

Cupich: Leo XIV shaped by Chicago upbringing

Cardinal says new pope will champion the environment and immigrants

By Angie Leventis Lourgos | Chicago Tribune

ROME — Chicago Cardinal Blase Cupich says Pope Leo XIV will prioritize the environment and needs of immigrants, citing major themes throughout the pontiff's homily during his inaugural Mass on Sunday.

The new pope, who hails from Chicago, will also work tirelessly to help end international conflicts, the cardinal said.

"He will continue speaking about how globalization marginalizes people," Cupich said during an interview Monday with the Tribune at Pontifical North American College, his alma mater. "Especially if the metric for measuring the success of globalization is economical and financial rather than how does it help people universally flourish. We are going to hear more about that, I'm positive."

But the archbishop of Chicago doesn't know when the Holy Father will return to his hometown for a visit — an appearance many have been clamoring for as the city celebrates its new home-grown pontiff. Vice President JD Vance invited the pope to visit the United States during a private meeting Monday and the pontiff could be heard responding "at some point" in video provided by Vatican media.

"We need to give him some breathing space here," Cupich said, with a little laugh. "He's got a lot of things on his plate right now. He has to make that decision."

Only one pope has ever traveled to Chicago: In 1979, Pope John Paul II's three-hour Mass in Grant Park attracted anywhere from 500,000 to 1.5 million attendees.

While the cardinal said he won't pressure the new pope to make an appearance in Chicago immediately, he pledged that once the pontiff is

Trump cuts may curtail fed scrutiny of school

Teacher at Garrison had dragged student with autism down hallway

By Jennifer Smith Richards and Jodi S. Cohen
ProPublica

A short video taken inside an Illinois school captured troubling behavior: A teacher gripping a 6-year-old boy with autism by the ankle and dragging him down the hallway on his back.

The early April incident would've been upsetting in any school, but it happened at the Garrison School, part of a special education district where at one time students were arrested at the highest rate of any district in the country. The teacher was charged with battery weeks later after pressure from the student's parents.

It's been about eight months since the U.S. Department of Education directed Garrison to change the way it responded to the behavior of students with disabilities. The department said it would monitor the Four Rivers Special Education District, which operates Garrison, following a ProPublica and Chicago Tribune investigation in 2022 that found the school frequently involved police and used controversial disciplinary methods.

But the department's Office for Civil Rights regional office in Chicago, which was responsible for Illinois and five other states, was one of seven abolished by President Donald Trump's administration in March; the offices were closed and their entire staff was fired.

The future of oversight at Four Rivers, in west-central Illinois, is now uncertain. There's no record of any communication from the Education Department to the district since Trump took office, and his administration has terminated an antidiscrimination agreement with at least one school district, in South Dakota.

Rare city dust storm fuels debates over role of agriculture

By Adriana Pérez
Chicago Tribune

A tall, imposing plume of agricultural sediment blew from central Illinois and over dry farmland to envelop Chicago, dropping visibility to near zero last week during a type of dust storm mostly seen in arid climates in the Middle East, North Africa and the southwestern U.S.

"It's pretty rare to have dust storms in Illinois," said Trent Ford, the Illinois state climatologist. "It's not unprecedented, but it's uncommon. And for a dust storm to affect Chicago is even more uncommon."

The last dust storm to hit Chicago occurred on May 31, 1985 — and the last one of this kind of magnitude it happened during the Dust Bowl in the early to mid-1930s. But Friday was the
