A crowd greeted Greenland's Foreign Minister Vivian Motzfeldt at the Nuuk airport Tuesday on her return from talks in Washington.

Trump's Threats to Allies Stir Worry U.S. Has Lost Its Way

Insults, tariffs have Davos attendees sensing a break in the international order

By YAROSLAV TROFIMOV

DAVOS, Switzerland—President Trump is showing up for an annual gathering of the global elite here in the Swiss Alps, swinging a wrecking ball at the international order.

Trump insists he will take possession of Greenland from NATO ally Denmark—by force if he has to. Ahead of his trip, he posted an image portraying him lecturing European leaders in front of a map in which Greenland, Canada and Venezuela are emblazoned with the Stars and Stripes.

On Thursday, he plans to unveil what he is calling a Board of Peace that aims to supplant the United Nations—and be led by him, in perpetuity.

The reactions from many U.S. allies and partners, some of them aired in public, many of them still only expressed in private, is stark: Trump's America seems to have lost its mind. The unfolding break is profound, and, to many outside the U.S., Washington's behavior defies any rational explanation.

The tone in Europe has hardened in recent days, after Trump announced punitive tariffs against European nations that sent troops for exercises in Greenland. Even far-right and nationalist parties courted by the Trump administration as an alternative to centrist politicians on the Continent have voiced outrage and called for retaliation.

Carl Bildt, the former prime minister of Sweden who now co-chairs the European Council on Foreign Relations, Tuesday described Trump's social-media post with the map as "a Nero warning"—a reference to the infamous Roman emperor blamed at the time for burning down the city.

Trump's message to the Norwegian prime minister that "I no longer feel an obligation to think purely of Peace" because he hadn't been given the Nobel Peace Prize shows a serious problem with the U.S. president's judgment, said Bernard Guetta, a French member of the European Parliament.

Ettore Sequi, a former secretary-general of the Italian foreign ministry, said Trump has made clear his desire to blow up the international system and summed up the situation.

Tariff Turmoil Returns, Rattling Markets

Greenland dispute, president's warning send stocks, bonds and the dollar down

By HANNAH ERIN LANG AND SAM GOLDFARB

Trade turmoil is back on Wall Street.

Stocks slumped on Tuesday after President Trump stepped up his campaign to take over Greenland and threatened new restrictions on trade with Europe should he not get his way.

The Nasdaq composite slid 2.4% in its worst day since October. The U.S. dollar retreated. The yield on the 10-year Treasury, a key gauge of borrowing costs, climbed to its highest level since August. Gold, seen as a haven asset during times of geopolitical or economic uncertainty, soared to records.

The moves interrupted a long calm in markets, raising the specter of the so-called Sell America trade—a dumping of U.S. and dollar-denominated assets that briefly racked markets after Trump unveiled plans for sweeping global tariffs early last year.

Trade deals and carve-outs have helped stocks recover since, with indexes hitting record after record, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average and S&P 500 notching highs just last week. But the prospect of conflict over Greenland reignited the market's fears.

Goldman's Top Lawyer Presents an Epstein Problem

Executive told others he was formulating contingency plan for Kathryn Ruemmler to leave Wall Street bank after disclosures

By ANNA MARIA ANDRIOTIS

When Kathryn Ruemmler, a top Washington lawyer with an elite pedigree, joined Goldman Sachs in 2020, she disclosed to top executives a connection that didn't appear on her LinkedIn page: Jeffrey Epstein. But it's what Goldman didn't know about her association with the notorious sex offender—details that have become public in the stream of documents released from Epstein's estate—that now looms over Ruemmler and the bank.

Ruemmler told Goldman's leaders when they hired her that she had business dealings with Epstein when she was a white-collar defense attorney at Latham & Watkins. It would later become public she met with Epstein dozens of times and exchanged friendly emails for years.

It turned out she was in the courtroom when Epstein was arraigned after his arrest on sex-trafficking charges in 2019, and Epstein listed her as one of the executors on his will as recently as Jan. 18, 2019. Epstein removed her name before he died on Aug. 10, 2019, while he was in prison awaiting trial.

The extent of their relationship has drawn scrutiny inside Goldman Sachs, where the 54-year-old lawyer is general counsel and a top adviser to CEO David Solomon.

Hotel Guests Get Too Much Of a View

Proper bathroom doors are a thing of the past

By KATIE DEIGHTON

First they came for the closets. Then they took the bath tubs. Now, hotels are stripping away the only thing separating us from the animals: the bathroom door.

Guests are waving goodbye to the luxury of a fully-closable opaque barrier between the restroom and bedroom, checking in to find sliding barn doors, curtains, strategically placed walls and other replacements that aren't as proficient in the art of noise and smell containment.

In some cases, they're not even good at hiding the view. Please turn to page A13

Netflix Sweetens Deal, Posts Strong Earnings

By JOE FLINT AND ISABELLA SIMONETTI

Netflix posted a 29% increase in profit on Tuesday, just hours after the company sweetened its deal to buy Warner Bros. Discovery studios and HBO Max streaming business with an all-cash offer aimed at keeping rival bidder Paramount at bay.

The all-cash deal of $27.75 a share replaces Netflix's previous cash-and-stock deal. The revamped offer comes as Paramount continues pushing its own all-cash offer for all of Warner Discovery. The value of Netflix's offer remains $72 billion.

Warner and Netflix said they expect the new structure to enable Warner shareholders to vote on the deal by April. The change could help sway some shareholders who might be weighing the two companies' agreement against Paramount's offer.

Netflix co-CEO Greg Peters said in a statement the revised agreement "demonstrates our commitment to the transaction" and accelerates the process for Warner shareholders.

Netflix stock has dropped about 15% since its deal with Warner was announced. The streaming company's shares fell about 5% in after-hours trading on Tuesday.

Netflix reported increased revenue and profit from the prior-year quarter and beat analyst forecasts, with popular series such as the final season of "Stranger Things" boosting viewership. The company attributed its growth to increases in subscribers, prices and ad revenue.

The streamer reported revenue of $12.05 billion, up almost 18% from a year earlier. Net income was $2.42 billion, a 29% rise from a year earlier. It also said it surpassed 325 million subscribers.
