CANCER screenings are being missed and crimes misrecorded because official statistics are 'corrupted' by extreme gender ideology, a review warned last night.

A government-commissioned report found that biological sex had been erased from official data in the police, NHS and even the military.

Fuelled by activism from within, official bodies have replaced sex with 'gender identity', putting patients and the public at risk, the independent review found. The merging of sex and gender had become 'widespread' in records over the past decade, it warned.

Women's rights campaigners last night called on the Government to act.

Maya Forstater, chief executive of Sex Matters, said: 'The problems are everywhere, from NHS records that do not record biological sex to police forces that
