

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

FRIDAY, MARCH 28, 2025

In Marlborough, the police force is 91 percent white
5.7 percent Hispanic
1.5 percent Black

JOHN TLUMACKI/GLOBE STAFF

Rafael Faria said he was targeted because he backed a colleague's bias complaint.

Officer's firing sparks a firestorm

Makeup of Marlborough force scrutinized

By Dan Glaun

GLOBE STAFF

Over the last two decades, a swell of newcomers from Brazil and Latin America have settled in the former industrial town of Marlborough, bringing new levels of diversity to the MetroWest community located just outside Worcester.

But if you look at the city's police force, you'd never know it. The department of 70 sworn officers has just six officers of color. And just over a year ago, one of its longest-serving officers of color was fired, in what he describes as retaliation for supporting a colleague's discrimination complaint against a white supervisor.

The firing of officer Rafael Faria has raised questions about equal treatment in the police force, by supporters who say his job should be restored. It also exemplifies a growing problem among Massachusetts' smaller, suburban departments that are struggling to build trust with the diversifying communities they serve.

"This is a significant issue that needs to be addressed to ensure better representation and fairness within the department," said Jeffrey Lopes, president of the Massachusetts Association of Minority Law Enforcement Officers.

Faria was fired following allegations that he misrepresented whether his search warrant applications had been reviewed by prosecutors. He has denied any wrongdoing, saying he believed he was following proper protocol and that he was targeted with an unfair investigation after supporting his colleague's discrimination complaint.

Faria's case taps into long-standing statewide concerns

MARLBOROUGH, Page A9

Tufts PhD candidate was taken out of state before judge could intervene

By Nick Stoico, John R. Ellement, and Giulia McDonnell Nieto del Rio

GLOBE STAFF

A Turkish graduate student at Tufts who was arrested by federal immigration agents this week had already been transferred out of the state before a federal judge issued an order for her to be kept in Massachusetts, according to court filings Thursday

The detention of Rumeysa Ozturk, a 30-year-old PhD candidate in the US on a student visa, has horrified her family and friends and sent shock waves through college campuses.

Secretary of State Marco Rubio, meanwhile, defended the detention of Ozturk and accused her of destabilizing her college campus as part of the pro-Palestinian movement last year.

"We gave you a visa to come and study and get a degree," Rubio said, "not to become a social activist that tears up our university campuses."

Ozturk had voiced support for the Palestinian movement, but was not known as a prominent leader.

Ozturk was arrested Tuesday by masked agents with US Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Somerville after she left her home to break her Ramadan fast. Later that day, US District Court Judge Indira Talwani ordered that she be kept in Massachusetts, records show.

But Assistant US Attorney Mark Sauter said in a court filing Thursday that ICE had transferred Ozturk to its detention facility in Louisiana before Talwani's order was issued. In a three-page response, the federal prosecutor said he notified Ozturk's lawyer at 5:30 p.m. Wednesday that she was in

TUFTS, Page A8

PILOTS REACT TO SIGNAL LEAK

Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth's refusal to acknowledge that he should not have disclosed sensitive information in a chat alarmed US fighter pilots. A4.

MORE JOBS TO BE LOST

The Department of Health and Human Services will lay off 10,000 and close entire agencies, Health Secretary Robert F. Kennedy Jr. said. A2.

Officials fear loss of international students amid crackdown, cuts

By Hilary Burns and Camilo Fonseca

GLOBE STAFF

Higher education leaders fear repercussions from Trump administration policies could threaten the country's standing as a top destination for international students, leading to a boycott that would hit their finances and campus culture at a time when many schools are already struggling financially.

Grants for scientific research have been eliminated without warning. Universities are laying off workers, closing labs, and cutting budgets. And now federal agents are trying to deport international students who have expressed support for Palestinians, further jeopardizing the ability of higher education institutions to recruit and retain talented students from around the world.

"A lot of people are averse to come and do their education in America, because they realize that if they come here, they're going to basically have stones thrown at them their entire time here," said Kwame Asare,

INTERNATIONAL STUDENTS, Page A8

Employees worked on the all-electric Porsche Macan at an assembly plant in Leipzig, Germany, last year. Under the president's plan, vehicles made anywhere but the US will face a 25 percent tariff starting April 3.

JENS SCHLUETER/GETTY IMAGES

Tariffs expected to stall world's automakers

By River Akira Davis, Emiliano Rodríguez Mega, and Ian Austen

NEW YORK TIMES

TOKYO — Mexico deployed thousands of National Guard troops to the border to deter migrants from reaching the United States. South Korea said it would invest $21 billion in expanding US manufacturing. Japanese officials descended on Washington, offering to invest $1 trillion in the United States and buy more American natural gas.

None of that was enough to prevent one of those countries' biggest tariff concerns from becoming a reality Wednesday, when President Trump declared that automobiles ►Car prices will go up. The question is when. B5.

and car parts imported to the United States would face a 25 percent tariff starting April 3.

Mexico, Japan, and South Korea, along with Canada, account for about 75 percent of US vehicle imports. Beyond direct exports, Japanese and South Korean automakers also manufacture many of the vehicles in Mexico and Canada that ultimately land in the American market, leaving them particularly exposed to the tariffs.

The tariffs will also hit Europe, particularly Germany, whose three largest carmakers make up nearly three-quarters of the European Union's automotive exports to the United States.

In the near term, Trump's new tariffs are expected to scramble foreign automakers' production operations and drag on their earnings.

Shares in Japan's Toyota Motor, Honda Motor, and Nissan Motor all fell about 2 percent in Asia trading Thursday. The stock prices of South Korea's Hyundai Motor and Kia, as well as Mazda Motor and Subaru — two smaller Japanese manufacturers particularly dependent on US sales — fell between 3 and 6 percent.

Shares in Germany's Volkswagen, Europe's largest automaker, fell 1.5 percent. Other German carmakers including Mercedes-Benz and BMW dropped 2 to 3 percent in European trading.

However, if the tariffs are prolonged — or even permanent, as

TARIFFS, Page A7

TONY GUTIERREZ/ASSOCIATED PRESS

SOX ARE OFF AND RUNNING

Boston Red Sox outfielder Willyer Abreu rounded the bases after hitting a ninth-inning, three-run homer against the Texas Rangers on Opening Day. It was the second of two home runs for Abreu as Boston won, 5-2. C1.

Day shift

Friday: Breezy, warmer. High: 55-60. Low: 38-43.

Saturday: Cloudy, damp. High: 40-45. Low: 35-40. Comics and Weather, G6-7. Obituaries, C11.

Archaeologists have unearthed the huge tomb of an unknown pharaoh at an Egyptian necropolis, a team of researchers said, in the second discovery of a king's tomb this year. A3.

Food banks across New England are scrambling after the Trump administration cut some $1 billion from programs that help them obtain food for distribution. B1.

For retiring ICA leader, a departing show

Amid culture war, she reaffirms the arts

By Murray Whyte

GLOBE STAFF

On a chilly February afternoon at the Institute of Contemporary Art, Jill Medvedow, its longtime director, walked into a gallery and stepped 27 years backward in time.

A few hours later, "Believers: Artists and the Shakers" would open with a roster of many of the same artists Medvedow had hosted at her first-ever exhibition as the ICA's new director in 1998. That show, "The Quiet in the Land," was about the Shakers, too, and the symmetry is no coincidence. At the end of this month, Medvedow will leave the ICA, the institution she all but created from scratch over her nearly three-decade tenure. The revival of the Shaker exhibition, she acknowledged, is a tacit farewell.

Despite the weight of circumstance, she wasn't in a sentimental mood, effusively lauding the exhibition, the current social relevance of the Shakers' devotion to communal spirit, the insightful choices made by Jeffrey De Blois, the show's curator. "I try very hard not to look back," she said.

Still, the opening celebrations that night — her last in the director's chair — would stir emotions. "It's not an easy moment," she said. "For me, leadership has always been the ability to both compartmentalize and to care deeply. So right now I'm trying to lean into the compartmentaliza-

MEDVEDOW, Page A9

VOL. 307, NO. 87

*

Suggested retail price
$4.00

