As royals mark 80th anniversary of the Auschwitz liberation, ROBERT HARDMAN's haunting dispatch

Before that gateway of death, they gathered for the last time – the handful of eyewitnesses to history's greatest abomination

THAT dreadful watch-tower had been encased in a colossal heated tent, a cattle wagon parked beneath its arch.

Lined up before this gateway of death, they gathered for the last time – the handful of eyewitnesses to history's greatest abomination.

Such was the backdrop to yesterday's commemorations of the 80th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, held inside a giant marquee to protect the most important guests – 56 very elderly Holocaust survivors – from the elements. Bathed in the soft glow of television studio lights, the terrifying tower looked almost cosy.

Yet it was fooling no one. Nor was that vintage wooden railway truck, spruced up with a new lick of paint.

For these exalted VIPs, this setting was – and always will be – the entrance to Hell. Hence some had already decided this would be their last return. Fresh
