

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 2025

Nonprofit leader to seek reins of Boston

Kraft prepares bid for mayor, cites housing crisis

By Emma Platoff
GLOBE STAFF

The promises were grand, but Sandy Zamor Calixte was skeptical.

It was 2014, and the Boys & Girls Club of Boston had bought the old library on Hazleton Street, with plans to renovate it into a hub for youth that would later become the Josh Kraft Mat-tapan Teen Center. Living near the site, Zamor Calixte feared the initial hoopla would fade and the facility would be left to languish, starved of the funding needed to keep kids busy.

Josh Kraft

Ultimately, it was none other than Kraft himself who assuaged her concerns.

Then the head of the Boys & Girls Club, Kraft reassured her the organization intended to invest in her neighborhood and has stayed committed in the decade since, down to ensuring that every neighbor still gets a flyer before the center's annual block party.

"He's listening," Zamor Calixte said. "People want to take away the fact that he's the son of a billionaire, but he has committed himself to community and to our youth."

The building — with Kraft's name emblazoned on the side — stands on Hazleton Street, a big brick symbol of the complexities ahead as Kraft prepares to launch a bid for Boston mayor on Tuesday.

The third son of Patriots owner Robert Kraft, Josh Kraft has had a long career of nonprofit leadership in Boston, work that those close to him say has improved the lives of countless young people in the city and

KRAFT, Page A10

Thermo Fisher Scientific revealed more layoffs, the second set in three months for the life sciences company. D1.

The expiration date on getting excited over the Red Sox Truck Day has long come and gone, Dan Shaughnessy writes. C1.

Mayor Michelle Wu wants food delivery apps to apply for permits to operate in Boston. B1.

Now, as a fragile cease-fire holds and as Israel and Hamas prepare for negotiations to extend the truce, four rival models for Gaza's future have taken shape. A4.

Get under ray

Tuesday: Sun late.
High 40-45, low 15-20.
Wednesday: Brisk, colder.
High 27-32, low 18-23.
Sunrise: 6:54. Sunset: 5:02.
Weather and comics, D5-6.
Obituaries, C9.
VOL. 307, NO. 35
*
Suggested retail price
$4.00

Truce in Trump trade war

New England consumers, businesses dodge a bullet

By Larry Edelman
GLOBE STAFF

It wasn't just Mexico and Canada that earned temporary reprieves from steep tariffs President Trump planned to impose on their exports Tuesday. New England consumers and businesses also caught a break.

From groceries to natural gas, from home construction to new cars, Trump's tariffs would have boosted the already-high cost of living in the region. Businesses faced a hit to profits from disrupted supply chains, increased component prices, and retaliatory tariffs on their own exports.

In a pair of last-minute agreements, the leaders of Canada and Mexico — America's top two trading partners — on Monday said they would step up efforts to stop the flow of migrants and illegal drugs at their borders with the United States. Trump said he would delay the

LOCAL FALLOUT, Page A6

President delays tariffs as Canada, Mexico vow more border help; China levies remain

By Alan Rappeport
NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON — President Trump on Monday delayed his planned tariffs on Canada and Mexico for 30 days after winning concessions from both countries to stem the flow of drugs and migrants into the United States, postponing, at least temporarily, a painful and potentially destabilizing trade war.

Tariffs of 10 percent are still set to go into effect on China on Tuesday morning. Trump said Monday that he was likely to talk with President Xi Jinping of China within the next 24 hours about a variety of contentious issues, and warned that the 10 percent tariff he has planned to impose was just an "opening salvo."

The chaotic last-minute maneuvering demonstrated Trump's willingness to use tariffs as leverage against America's most important trading partners despite the potential for severe economic consequences. Imports from Mexico, China, and Canada account for one-third of the products brought into the United States, more than $1 trillion in goods a year. Economists projected that the tariffs and the anticipated retaliatory measures could fan inflation and disrupt global supply chains.

TARIFFS, Page A6

JOSPIN MWISHA/AFP VIA GETTY IMAGES

USAID provided tents and other supplies at a refugee camp on the outskirts of Goma, Congo, amid intense battles nearby.

Taking aim at beacon of global hope

President, Musk see USAID as broken; backers say agency bolsters US influence

By Sam Brodey
and Jim Puzzanghera
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — After taking office, President Trump and his most powerful ally, billionaire Elon Musk, outlined a long list of federal offices and programs they wanted to drastically scale back or outright kill.

Few anticipated that their first big target would be a humanitarian aid agency that accounts for a small fraction of the federal budget and has been long supported by members of both parties.

The Agency for International Development, or USAID, supports a wide range of programs in countries around the world, from disaster relief to public health. With a budget of $42.4 billion in 2023, less than 1 percent of overall federal expenditures that fiscal year, it funds initiatives that have long been supported domestically as an inexpensive but effective form of soft US power.

Less than two weeks after

Trump's inauguration, however, Musk — empowered by the president to lead the ad hoc "Department of Government Efficiency" federal spending reduction project — said it was "time" for USAID to "die." On Monday, employees at the agency's Washington, D.C., headquarters were told to stay home by a young Musk aide.

By the afternoon, Secretary of State Marco Rubio was named acting head of the agency, putting its future very much in doubt, while congressional Democrats rallied opposition outside the building along with USAID employees and

USAID, Page A5

Chaos for aid groups

The move to shutter the Agency for International Development has generated confusion across humanitarian organizations in Boston. B1.

EPA targeted

The Trump administration warned 1,100 Environmental Protection Agency employees they could be fired at any time. A2.

In search of data

Researchers scrambled to sort out what public data the administration has deleted from websites. A5.

‘Ozempic has a great braking effect on, let’s call it, gluttonous impulses.’

EDWARD FAY, who has been taking the drug since July

Researchers exploring if obesity drugs could curb cravings beyond food

By Jonathan Saltzman
GLOBE STAFF

Edward Fay began taking the blockbuster drug Ozempic for diabetes in July and is delighted with the results: His blood sugar levels have fallen and, with his cravings for cookies and Pop-Tarts curbed, he's lost 40 pounds.

The retired Somerville software engineer wasn't surprised, given the medicine's reputation. What startled him was its effect on something else: his taste for alcohol. Fay said he used to consume 15 drinks of Scotch, beer, or wine a week. Now, if he has five alcoholic beverages a week, it's a lot.

"It now takes a concerted effort to finish a drink," Fay, 63, said. "Ozempic," he added, "has a great braking effect on, let's call it, gluttonous impulses."

For years, scientists have known that the class of medicines called GLP-1s lessened the rewarding effects of addictive drugs, including alcohol, nicotine, and opioids, in laboratory rodents. Now, as the pricey medicines have become perches the world's hottest pharmaceutical products — and Massachusetts has seen one of the country's sharpest rises in prescriptions — a small but growing number of studies suggest

CRAVINGS, Page A7

JONATHAN WIGGS/GLOBE STAFF

Edward Fay, a retired software engineer in Somerville, says while on Ozempic he has lost 40 pounds — and curbed his appetite for alcohol.