Broadcom's Chief Helped Seal $63 Billion Anthropic Debt Deal

Agreement is the biggest ever to raise money for AI infrastructure

*By Alexander Saeedy, Anissa Gardizy and Matt Wirz

Hock Tan was running out of patience.

The chief executive of chip maker Broadcom had spent nearly two months trying to get banks to commit over $40 billion to the largest artificial-intelligence debt deal ever. It was meant to allow Anthropic to lease specialized chips that Broadcom is developing with Alphabet's Google.

Though Anthropic was the main beneficiary of the deal, the startup needed help from its bigger commercial partners to raise the money. Together, Anthropic and Broadcom were trying to close the deal ahead of Anthropic's filing for its widely anticipated initial public offering.

Broadcom, the supplier of chips to Anthropic, was at the center of the action. Thanks to its sterling credit rating, the company had already agreed to provide some financial guarantees to make banks more comfortable with the sizable risk of lending over $40 billion. But over the past few weeks, some of the banks grew increasingly anxious about participating in the deal, known as "Project North Star," people familiar with the matter said.

Given the rise in interest rates and growing difficulties in the markets for artificial-intelligence ventures, some banks felt that they weren't being compensated enough to take the risk and considered pulling out altogether, the people said.

In the end, Broadcom's CEO held 11th-hour talks with bank executives over the weekend to get them to finalize their commitment to the deal and also agreed to higher interest rates on the loans, the people familiar with the matter said.

Banks also got more comfort around the guarantees from Broadcom that will protect them from losses in case Anthropic defaults on the loans, the people said. The deal, led by Bank of America, Citigroup and Morgan Stanley, was announced late Monday

U.S. Plans To Renew Striking Iran After Midterms

Warning to Gulf states signals a short and intense escalation of war

DUBAI—The U.S. has told several Gulf Arab countries to be prepared for a short, intense military campaign after the U.S. midterm election, people briefed on the conversations said.

*By Summer Said, Shelby Holliday, Benoit Faucon and Anat Peled

The communications through diplomatic and military channels are among a growing number of indications that the U.S. and Israel are readying to launch a new round of heavy combat operations against Iran, risking a major escalation in hopes of degrading Tehran's strength and pushing it toward negotiations.

The U.S. is sending an additional Patriot system to Israel from Texas to beef up missile defenses in the country, according to flight tracking data and two officials with knowledge of the movement. The U.S. has also moved troops off bases in the Middle East where they were vulnerable in preparation for an escalation, The Wall Street Journal has reported.

U.S. forces in the region have been restocking their munitions, and bomber aircraft and fighter jets are preparing for strikes, some of the officials said. An additional aircraft carrier strike group and Marine expeditionary unit are also poised to join an armada of about 20 other warships op-

Tariff Exposes U.S. Reliance On Canada's Aluminum

Smelters in Quebec run on inexpensive hydroelectric power; Trump's 50% levy pushes up prices for American industry

BY RYAN DEZEMBER

SAGUENAY, Quebec—When Nazi planes were blitzing London during World War II and the U.S. needed to build more aircraft and munitions in a hurry, it helped turn this remote place in the Canadian forest into an aluminum-production juggernaut.

Thousands of Canadians labored through frigid conditions to build smelting pots and a hydropower plant to fuel them—in just 18 months. Ever since then, Saguenay's aluminum plants have supplied American industry.

Now, President Trump's trade war has cast Canada's aluminum smelters as the enemy—and U.S. businesses and consumers are paying a price.

During parts of his first term, Trump exempted Canada from a 10% aluminum tariff that he imposed on other trading partners. After he returned to the White House, he stripped Canada of its exemption and raised the tariff rate on aluminum to 50%.

"They've treated the United States very unfairly," Trump said last month about Canada. "They have been one of the worst countries in the entire world." He has said the

Drill Sergeants vs. Treat-Slingers: The War Over Training Your Dog

Disciplinarians say snack-obsessed trainers are turning pooches into disrespectful brats

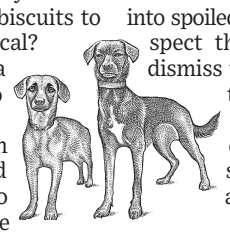

BY JAMIE WATERS

Does your precious pup snap and yap at anything that moves? Do you always reach for a fistful of liver biscuits to placate the little rascal?

Brian Lee has a big, juicy bone to pick with you.

Lee, 66, a veteran dog behaviorist and trainer, thinks too many owners are spoiling their pooches. And, like a toddler who's never told "no," it's turning the mutts into not-very-good boys.

"It's all treats, treats, treats, so help me God," Lee barked on a call from his home in Redondo Beach, a wealthy coastal city near Los Angeles. "It's no different than giving your kid a BMW on his 16th birthday."

Who's in charge?

Lee's crusade has animated a fiery debate in the dog-training world. While some say a snack tsunami is turning dogs into spoiled brats who don't respect their owners, others dismiss this as garbage. The trainer-on-trainer attacks can get vicious. One trainer said even lawyers are nicer to one another.

Giving dogs "far too many food rewards" is "the biggest problem with dog training at the moment," said Dr. Ian Dunbar, a veterinarian and animal behaviorist in Berkeley, Calif.

Broadly speaking, modern dog training is split into two camps. "Positive" trainers gen-

China Claims Strong Growth, But Skeptics Question Its Data

BY KATRINA NORTHROP

SINGAPORE—China has reported robust growth this year, despite a continuing crash in its property market and consumer spending that is largely at a standstill. That is stirring questions that have long dogged China's official data: Are the numbers accurate?

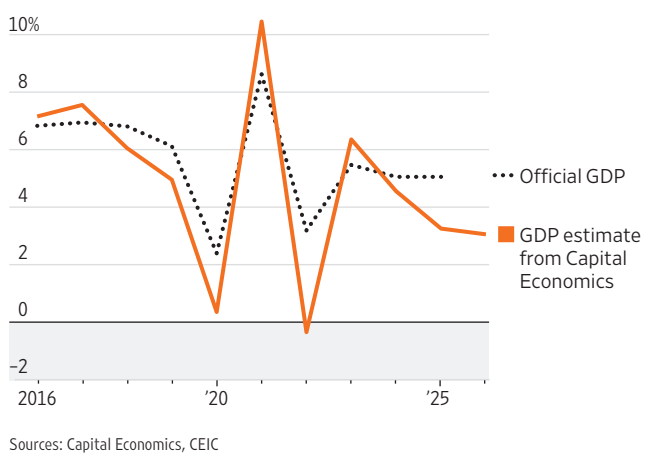

Opaque collection methods and concerns about political influence have for years cast doubts on Beijing's economic data. But as the country grapples with a persistent slowdown that doesn't always show up in government figures, that skepticism is growing louder.

Estimates from some Western analysts for China's full-year growth range from 0% to 3%, far lower than the 4.5% expansion Beijing reported for the third quarter. Moreover, several prominent economists in China are arguing that the unemployment rate—which edged down to 5.2% in September, according to government figures—masks a more serious jobs crisis.

"There really is no comparable case where you have an economy of such significant size where the macroeconomic data is so problematic," said Daniel Rosen, co-founder of Rhodium Group, which produces an alternative assess-
