U.S. Hiring Bounces Back

By JUSTIN LAHART

The U.S. added 162,000 jobs in August, the Labor Department reported Friday, a much-stronger-than-expected result that suggested the labor market shook off its early-summer doldrums.

The unemployment rate stayed steady at 4.1%, at a historically low level that indicates the labor market remains generally healthy.

Economists polled by The Wall Street Journal had forecast the report would show the economy gained just 53,000 jobs. The unemployment rate was in line with their expectations.

The jump in jobs came in part from rebounds in restaurant and in local-education employment that many economists viewed as one-off factors. But the U.S. has added an average of 80,000 jobs a month so far this year, which compares with monthly growth of 10,000 jobs in 2025.

"We don't have a problem in the labor market," said Joe Brusuelas, chief economist at RSM.

Hiring had weakened considerably in June and July, and so the August job gains helped dispel concerns that the labor market had re-en-

Inside Fetterman's Chaotic Office

Senator dodges voters, alienates staff

By WILL HOBSON AND SIOBHAN HUGHES

One morning in June, three paralyzed military veterans in wheelchairs from rural Pennsylvania arrived at the office of Sen. John Fetterman for a long-awaited meeting to discuss legislation that would improve their care.

Fetterman's staff greeted them with bad news: The Pennsylvania Democrat had to cancel. He'd told his staff he may have eaten something bad and wasn't feeling well, according to people familiar with the matter.

Less than an hour after his staffers met with the veterans in his place, Fetterman walked into his office, showing no signs of illness. He had an appointment he didn't want to miss, he told staff: an interview on Fox News to discuss Israel and the war in Iran.

Tide Turns on Iran In Blockade Battle

By YAROSLAV TROFIMOV

DUBAI—By squeezing the Strait of Hormuz, both the U.S. and Iran expected to outlast their foe, making time work in their favor.

Now, it looks like the trend is moving against Tehran.

The U.S. naval blockade has prevented Iran from shipping any oil from the Persian Gulf since July. And despite Iranian drone and missile attacks, Washington has been able to assist Gulf Arab states in moving significant amounts of their crude through the waterway, keeping global oil prices from surging beyond critical levels.

"The Iranian blockade is more leaky than the U.S. blockade," said Samir Madani, co-founder of the maritime-intelligence firm TankerTrack.

Adam Benson works in cybersecurity by day. By night, he's trying to hack the code for Starbucks's iced chai.

The 58-year-old dad became hooked on the chain's tea lattes in 2001, when he started dating his now wife and was searching for a sweet beverage to sip alongside her. Soon, he was splurging on a chai two to four times a week.

Crypto Traders Flock To Prediction Markets

By VICKY GE HUANG
AND KRYSTAL HUR

First, the AI trade stole bitcoin's thunder. Now, the cryptosphere is losing some of its most-loyal traders to bets on soccer matches and congressional elections.

This year's shift into highly-flying artificial-intelligence stocks (and out of bitcoin and other popular digital currencies) steepened a yearlong crypto slump. But it has been individual traders' recent affection for prediction markets that is extending the crypto winter even as AI stocks wobble.

Prices on bitcoin, the world's biggest digital currency, recently traded around $79,000. Even with a rebound in the last two weeks because of the Treasury's expanded bond buyback program, it is still about 37% below its record of more than $126,000 in October 2025.

Many of the same traders who fueled crypto's past rallies are now spending more time and money on event-based contracts. These contracts offer yes-or-no wagers on everything from the outcome of state elections to the Federal Reserve's next interest-rate move to who will be the next James Bond—and they are easier to trade than trying to make sense of crypto's boom-and-bust cycles, some traders said.
