LABOUR BLASTED OVER 'TOOTHLESS' GROOMING PROBES

Ministers finally announce 'local reviews' into child abuse scandal – but critics insist full national inquiry is needed

By Martin Beckford

LABOUR faced fury last night for launching 'toothless' small-scale probes into grooming gangs instead of a full national inquiry.

Yvette Cooper announced five local reviews into badly hit towns, as Labour backtracked after previously insisting that no new investigations were needed.

The Home Secretary also said there would be a 'rapid audit' of the scale of child sexual exploitation across the country that would look into the ethnicity of perpetrators as part of a £10million action plan.

But Ms Cooper refused to answer pleas for the new probes to have the power to summon witnesses, a key requirement of victims as well as politicians on all sides.

And she continued to defy calls for a national public inquiry into the scandal, despite admitting there were currently 127 'major police investigations' under way into child sexual
