

AMIRHOSEIN KHORGHOEI Iranian Students' News Agency

IRAN SAYS it will continue to regulate traffic in the Strait of Hormuz, a claim denied by the White House.

Victims may ‘die before they get paid’

As D.A. demands a freeze on sex abuse payouts, attorneys say clients are desperate.

By Rebecca Ellis

With the first tranche of money from Los Angeles County’s $4-billion sex abuse settlement scheduled to hit victims’ bank accounts next week, the county’s district attorney made a last-ditch effort Monday to stop the payouts, which he says are rife with fake claims.

Dist. Atty. Nathan Hochman asked the judge presiding over the case to halt the historic payout, while the county’s legal team fought to keep the deal on track.

“This is among the most remarkable things I’ve ever seen as a legal professional,” said Superior Court Judge Lawrence Riff, who oversees the bulk of the sex abuse cases.

“We have the county of Los Angeles with its county counsel’s office, which is a very substantial and sophisticated office, telling me this payment program should go forward,” Riff said. “And I have the D.A. from the same county telling me it shouldn’t, and that the county of Los Angeles is inadequate to protect these funds.”

Riff held off on making a decision on Hochman’s request for a six-month delay, asking the lawyers to halt payments until another hearing scheduled for June 25. The six-month delay was vehemently opposed by most plaintiff attorneys, who say their clients have suffered horrific abuse and are in desperate need of cash.

“I believe some of my clients will die before they get paid if this is delayed,” said attorney Raymond Boucher. See [Settlement, A7]

Newsom says he and wife are targets of U.S. probe

He alleges Trump is going after rivals ‘one by one’

By Kevin Rector, Dakota Smith, Brittny Mejia and Taryn Luna

Gov. Gavin Newsom on Monday accused the Justice Department of launching — at President Trump’s request — a baseless and politically motivated investigation into him and his wife, First Partner Jennifer Siebel Newsom.

“After calling for my arrest last year, Donald Trump directed his Department of Justice to investigate me,” Newsom said. “And just in the last week, I’ve learned his campaign has reached my own home: To get me, he’s coming after my wife, Jen.”

Newsom adamantly denied any wrongdoing by him or his wife. The White House declined to respond to Newsom’s allegations that Trump was involved in instigating the probes, referring all questions to the Justice Department, which declined to comment.

A source familiar with the matter who requested anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss it publicly told The Times that there are two federal probes underway, one related to Newsom’s former chief of staff, Dana Williamson, and one related to Siebel Newsom’s taxes.

The source said both investigations have been ongoing for about a year, were launched by federal prosecutors in Sacramento based on information provided by whistleblowers in California, and were not the result of directives out of Washington.

Lauren Horwood, a spokesperson for the office of U.S. Atty. Eric Grant, a Trump appointee who oversees federal prosecutors in Sacramento, said the office “does not confirm or deny the existence of investigations.”

Siebel Newsom, in her own statement, said there “are clearly no boundaries to what Donald Trump will do to get his way or to challenge those who get in his way,” and that she and the govern-

A star destined for U.S. stripes

Brooklyn-born but London-raised, Balogun shines on World Cup turf

By Kevin Baxter

RONALDO BOLAÑOS Los Angeles Times

FORWARD Folarin Balogun scores against Paraguay in the U.S.’ 4-1 group stage win Friday in Inglewood.

SEATTLE — If a pregnant Nigerian woman had been allowed to board a plane 25 years ago, the U.S. team’s path through this summer’s World Cup might have unfolded much differently. Instead, a gate agent turned her away, insisting it wasn’t safe for her to fly from New York to London.

So Florence Balogun returned to Brooklyn, where she had been visiting relatives, and waited for her second son to be born. And when Folarin arrived a few weeks later, entering the world just hours before Independence Day dawned, he did so as an American citizen.

It was that quirk of fate that allowed Balogun, who lived just two months in the U.S., to represent the country on soccer’s biggest stage.

“I’m extremely proud my individual journey will come full circle now,” he said before the tournament. “Especially the World Cup being here, the opportunity to represent my nation. It’s going to be something special for me.”

See [Balogun, A6]

TORN OVER TEAM: Iranians gather at SoFi to cheer but also to protest. B10

What’s inside the America250 time capsule

By Holly Ramer

CONCORD, N.H. — Paper, the traditional gift for marking a couple’s first year of marriage, also is a great choice for 250th anniversaries — especially when filling a time capsule celebrating American independence.

The 2016 law creating the nonpartisan America250 commission mandated that a time capsule be buried in Philadelphia on July 4, 2026, and dug up 250 years later in 2276. Last week, the resulting 900-pound cylinder was sealed shut, capping years of technical design and construction, collaboration with states and meticulous review of collected items.

“Once it was closed, it was a little bit anticlimactic, and then it was kind of really emotional,” said Michael Berilla, who directs the fabrication technology office at the National Institute of Standards and Technology and led the team that designed and built the capsule.

Berilla’s office, part of the Department of Commerce, has built encasements to protect historical documents in the past, but those tend to be stored indoors under carefully controlled conditions. With time capsules, the No. 1 enemy is water, so much of the design work focused on how to keep it out.

The stainless steel capsule is cylindrical, avoiding square edges that tend to crack and break. It will be covered with a secondary cylinder that will trap air and push out any approaching water, and the capsule itself is rimmed with a soft metal that compresses under pressure.

“When you smash it shut with the lid, that metal goes into all the cracks and spaces and makes an airtight, watertight seal,” Berilla said.

See [Time capsule, A7]

A vague deal with Iran leaves top questions unanswered

Trump and leaders in Tehran make conflicting statements about strait, weapons.

By Michael Wilner and Nabih Bulos

WASHINGTON — The terms of a deal to end President Trump’s war with Iran remained a secret on Monday as both sides claimed victory and the months-long conflict reached a nebulous end.

The memorandum of understanding, providing a rough framework to conclude the war, was signed digitally Sunday, with a ceremony scheduled to take place on Friday in Switzerland, U.S. officials said.

Trump hailed the document as a breakthrough after months of negotiations. Yet its broad contours remained unclear more than a day after the deal was announced, as each side offered conflicting public messaging about what had been agreed.

Iran said it would continue regulating traffic through the Strait of Hormuz, a strategic paradigm shift from the prewar status quo that was denied by the White House. The two sides expressed disagreement over whether the status of Iran’s ballistic missile program would be addressed in future negotiations, or whether Israel’s withdrawal from Lebanon was a part of the deal.

And Trump administration officials rejected Iranian claims that the United States would provide immediate sanctions relief as misleading “spin.”

Hours later, another U.S. official suggested that Iran, in fact, might receive some relief at the front end.

“We are prepared to release frozen funds, and we are prepared to release sanctions,” a senior U.S. official told reporters on a call. “And we’ll do some small gestures of that in the beginning, if they make some small gestures to us that show they’re willing to meet their commitments as well.”

“We’ll know over the next See [Deal, A5]

Restoring oil flow could take months

Many factors will delay a resumption of passage through the Strait of Hormuz.

By David McHugh and Cathy Bussewitz

FRANKFURT, Germany — The tentative agreement to end the war in Iran and reopen the Strait of Hormuz would be good news for the global economy. But even as the price of oil dropped Monday, many questions remained about when and how it would start flowing again through the world’s most vital artery for energy shipments.

Before the war, the strait carried a fifth of the world’s crude oil. Now, it will take time for hundreds of ships, trapped in the Persian Gulf to exit through the narrow strait. And gulf oil producers that throttled back production will need time to get the oil moving again. Analysts also say ship captains may take their time to decide whether passage is safe and that the threat of attack from Iran has truly receded.

All told, oil prices, inflation and energy flows simply won’t see an immediate return to what they were before the war — not for weeks or even months. And that’s assuming the deal, set to be signed Friday, proves durable. Details of the agreement have not been released.

When will oil start moving again?

Even if the strait is completely open, it will take time for tankers to enter, load and make the journey to Asian countries — the chief customers for gulf oil from Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait and Oman. A trip to Japan and back can take 45 to 50 days.

Captains, insurers and See [Oil, A5]

CHRISTINA HOUSE Los Angeles Times

STRUGGLES AFTER RAIDS

Southland car washes and workers are still trying to recover from the immigration crackdown that started last summer. CALIFORNIA, B1

8 presumed dead in B-52 crash

The plane crash at Edwards Air Force Base occurred during a “routine test mission.” CALIFORNIA, B1

Weather Partly sunny. L.A. Basin: 80/62. B6
Markets A11
Opinion Voices A12

Fox Corp. makes big bet on Roku

A $22-billion deal would get firm the streamer that reaches 100 million consumers globally. BUSINESS, A9

For the latest news, go to latimes.com.

