EDDIE ANDELMAN 1936-2026

A feisty, uproarious voice for everyday fans

Sports radio pioneer began with bantering in bar

By John Powers
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Eddie Andelman, the voluble voice who pioneered sports talk radio in Boston in the early 1970s, has died at the age of 89.

His family announced his death but no details were provided. He lived in Natick.

Mr. Andelman, who advocated for average fans and railed against team owners he felt took advantage of them, was behind the microphone at multiple stations around the dial for nearly four de-cadecades and more than 13,000 shows. Along the way, he also raised millions of dollars for charities, most notably for cystic fibrosis research.

But he was best known for his founding role in “The Sports Huddle,” a call-in discussion among Mr. Andelman and friends Jim McCarthy and Mark Witkin that began in 1969 and came to define the genre.

“I caused riots,” said Mr. Andelman, who was the most outspoken and outrageous member of the trio. “Nobody was doing the kind of stuff I did.”

His talk-show fame was a fluke, he said.

“I was sitting at a bar talking sports with my buddies and some guy was listening to us,” he recalled. “I told him to butt out. He said he owned a radio station and liked what I was saying and how I was saying it.”

So Mr. Andelman and his friends ended up with a Sunday night show on WUNR, a small Brookline station.

“We followed the Portuguese Hour,” he said. “That was our lead-in. On the

FOR HIM, A DIPLOMA IN DETERMINATION

The barriers were many for deaf teen, but he broke past with help from school Until age 9, Deibyn Orozco lived in a silent world of his own.

Born deaf in rural Guatemala, Orozco did not have anywhere that could help with his disability, much less teach him sign language. He communicated with his mother in rudimentary ways, sharing the unspoken language of gestures and affection that often exists between a mother and her child.

Orozco went to a local school, but it was not for a child like him. He could not listen to the teacher’s lessons, could not read the books, could not write notes, and could not hear the other children laugh.

“He was lost in this world,” said his mother, Aneida Mauricio, who gave birth to him when she was 14. “He didn’t even know his own name.”

A decade later, and some 3,000 miles from his former home, Orozco stepped up to a podium Friday in Charlestown to receive his high school diploma from the Horace Mann School for the Deaf and Hard of Hearing. Every graduation season, there are stories of students who have overcome obstacles. Orozco’s resilience sets him apart.

Hot Divorcée Summer: Divide and conquer

It’s a vibe, not necessarily a marital status

BETH TEITELL

Finally, another chance for those of us who failed at important looks of summers gone by: Hot Girl Summer, Hot Vax Summer, Brat Summer. A new seasonal aspirational opportunity has arrived.

Hot Trad Wife Summer. No, I’m kidding. Trad Wife Season is in the fall. It’s Hot Divorcée Summer.

And if you haven’t been through a romantic split, don’t panic. As Vogue wrote in early June, “crucially,” Hot Divorcée Summer “is not just for divorcees.”

Crucially! Especially for brands that want to “tap in” to the consumer cohort, in Vogue parlance.

Speaking as someone who is happily married — but also, alas, in the grip of Hot Bunion Summer — HDS could be my ticket to something new.

I called a friend hoping for companionship, but she had a question. What’s involved?

Like all meaningful trends, HDS is not solely superficial; it’s a vibe, a mindset, as explained by

MGB’s bid to buy hospital thwarted

Owner of Norwood site gave unacceptable reply that ended talks, lawmaker says

For roughly two years, the massive skeleton of a hospital has stood unfinished in Norwood, an unsightly symbol of the spectacular downfall of its disgraced and bankrupt former operator, Steward Health Care.

Community members and local officials have long pushed for the completion of the replacement to the flood-ravaged Norwood Hospital, with little luck. Now government officials have revealed that Mass General Brigham held talks late last year with the property’s owner to buy the 11-acre construction site in the hopes of finally completing the project and reopening the hospital.

But the owner, Medical Properties Trust, an Alabama real estate investment trust, sought “flagrantly unreasonable” sums from MGB, and the negotiations fizzled out, according to Representative John H. Rogers. The Norwood Democrat said he had personally encouraged both sides to make a deal.

The talks between MGB and MPT, which have not been reported, began late last fall and continued into early this year. MPT requested $250 million, Rogers said, but the state’s biggest health care system said that was too much. The owner came back with another price, Rogers said: $375 million.

UMass taps private funds for dorms

Deal with developer a trend for cash-strapped colleges

By Diti Kohli

Over the next few years, the University of Massachusetts will revamp dorms across its campus with a partner from private industry: American Campus Communities.

The nation’s largest student housing developer — a subsidiary of giant investment firm Blackstone — will lead a “comprehensive, long-range, and phased plan to modernize” dorms and amenities at UMass, using private money to fuel a major upgrade at the state’s flagship university.

It is the kind of deal that would be unheard of 20 years ago but is typical today as cash-strapped schools tap the pockets of private developers to build and renovate much-needed student housing. The dynamic has fundamentally flipped who creates the rooms where thousands of young people in Massachusetts live.

These days, rather than financing dorm projects with their own budgets, universities partner with a cottage industry of private companies to fund furnished apartments on university-owned land.

The result: Towers that look, feel, and cost the same (or sometimes more) as dorm rooms, with outside employees taking on the role of resident assistants. Rent for the off-campus buildings is typically paid to the developer, not the school, even though university rules can apply to the student residents.

Northeastern University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and UMass campuses in both Boston and Amherst are among the schools that have followed this model.
