Epstein money trail is new focus

Congress seeks his records from two large banks

WASHINGTON — Now that the Justice Department is legally required to make its files public on accused sex trafficker Jeffrey Epstein, the next battlefront is the quest for a separate collection of his financial records as key members of Congress pursue a time-tested strategy for uncovering wrongdoing: follow the money.

The House Oversight Committee on Tuesday sent subpoenas to JP Morgan Chase and Deutsche Bank for records on the deceased financier, who had accounts with them, and Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren has also called for a Senate hearing with bank executives. President Trump publicly asked Attorney General Pam Bondi to investigate JP Morgan Chase. Lawmakers are also seeking what are known as suspicious activity reports from the Treasury Department about Epstein's transactions that could shed more light on his activities.

"Following the money is at the heart of dealing with corrupt behavior," said Oregon Senator Ron Wyden, the top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, who began investigating Epstein's financial transactions three years ago that uncovered 4,725 wire transfers from one Epstein bank account totaling almost $1.1 billion, among other unusual activity. "He was doing deals involving very wealthy people who financed his activities and people who were procuring sex trafficking services, based on every-

The ruin at the end of the drug conduit

Bill May's leg spasmed as he sank into a tattered chair and recounted the life that brought him here: to a living room with holes punched in the drywall, a woman writhing on the couch in a drug stupor, and empty Narcan bottles littered about.

It was cold outside on this November morning as May reminisced about bygone high school football games, the birth of his two daughters, the summer he coached tee ball, and, most recently, the day federal agents stormed this house with rifles drawn, one of dozens of supposed drug raids the Trump administration touted far and wide.

He had scrambled down the stairs so quickly that morning he forgot to slip on a shirt. Outside, he locked eyes with local police officers, familiar faces shrouded in tactical gear. They drove him to the police station, where, for all of the drama surrounding his arrest, he was only charged with failure to pay a two-year-old fine. May didn't have the $1,000, but was released shortly after posing for a booking photo. Within days, his shirtless mugshot had gone viral. Police in Franklin posted the image in an online

How artful are the region's museum thieves?

Louvre heist grabbed attention, but smaller venues are the more likely targets

In February 2020, a masked burglar used an ax when he robbed the Greater Middletown Military Museum in Connecticut.

His hood pulled tight against the midnight air, the masked figure approached the back entrance of the Greater Middletown Military Museum in Connecticut, raised the ax he'd brought for the job, and swung it down hard on the lock.

The door didn't give, and surveillance footage from February 2020 shows the intruder circled around to the front after a few fruitless whacks. There, authorities said, he smashed a set of windows and a glass case, pocketed a nonfiring training pistol, and fled into the woods.

"The Thomas Crown Affair" this was not: Police caught the robber within days and charged him in the theft. The heist garnered a smattering of local headlines, but it was a far cry from the brazen attack last month on the Louvre Museum, when burglars unburdened the vaunted collection of more than $100 million worth of jewels in just seven minutes.

Few misdeeds capture the popular imagination like a high-stakes museum heist, a heady cocktail of culture and crime that conjures images of reclusive aesthetes and suave crime rings of Swiss-

A sprawling project, a state senator's brother, and $143m in suits

The pitch from Andrew J. Collins worked over and over again. He portrayed himself as a sophisticated South Boston developer with strong local ties, poised to launch a sprawling real estate project that would revitalize an industrial stretch along Dorchester Avenue.

He was charismatic, persuasive, and — left unsaid — the identical twin brother of South Boston state Senator Nick Collins.

Investors flocked in, loaning Andrew Collins and entities he controlled millions of dollars over the past eight years, according to court filings, lured by the promise of lucrative returns.

Now, at least 11 of those investors have sued Collins in state and federal court, claiming he owes them about $143 million in all. Some have already won judgments, while others remain in line to get repaid.
