

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

SATURDAY, MAY 10, 2025

Bus driver in fatal crash tried to flee, calls show

Parked cars also hit, according to police radio

By John Hilliard
GLOBE STAFF

The driver of a Boston Public Schools bus that struck and killed a 5-year-old boy in Hyde Park last week attempted to flee the scene following the crash, according to recordings of police calls reviewed by the Globe.

Those recordings also indicate that just a few minutes earlier, the same school bus hit at least two parked cars in Mattapan while children were on board, then drove away.

Authorities have provided few updates about the death of Lens A. Joseph on April 28, who was hit by his school bus after he was dropped off on Washington Street around 2:45 p.m. on his way home from Up Academy in Dorchester, authorities have said.

But, more than two hours of recordings of Boston police radio calls that were reviewed by the Globe Friday revealed officers had been advised about the bus shortly before the deadly crash in Hyde Park.

Around 2:20 p.m., a police dispatcher told a cruiser that a caller from Goodale Road in Mattapan witnessed a school bus hitting two parked cars, according to police radio calls.

Children were on board the bus at the time, the dispatcher said.

The dispatcher gave the identification number of the bus — 015 — and said it “took off” on Walk Hill Street toward the nearby cemetery, BUS, Page A7

A point of pride for Black Catholics

Pope Leo’s ancestry includes Creole roots

By Danny McDonald
GLOBE STAFF

Meyer Chambers, director of the Archdiocese of Boston’s Black Catholic Choir, did not know anything about Robert Prevost when the Chicago-born cardinal became this week Pope Leo XIV, the new leader of the Roman Catholic Church and the first born in the US.

But turns out Chambers and the pontiff have much in common, including roots in the Seventh Ward of New Orleans, where the pope’s maternal grandparents, both of whom are reportedly described as Black or mulatto in various historical records, married and lived. They can also both trace ancestry back to Haiti.

“The longer I’m on the planet, the less I’m surprised when I hear things,” he said of the pope’s roots.

On Friday, Chambers was among Black Bostonians to react with warmth REACTION, Page A6

Öztürk freed from custody

Will return to Tufts to await deportation case; judge cites chilling effect

‘Thanks so much for all the support and love.’

RÜMEYSA ÖZTÜRK, speaking to supporters on her release

PHOTOS BY KATHLEEN FLYNN FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

Rümeysa Öztürk (right) walked out of the ICE processing center in Basile, La., on Friday evening, six weeks after being detained.

By Sean Cotter,
Giulia McDonnell Nieto del Rio,
and Mark Arsenaault
GLOBE STAFF

BASILE, La. — She appeared on screen in orange prison garb, beamed in remotely Friday morning from a stark room in a detention facility in Louisiana. It was the first time friends and supporters saw Rümeysa Öztürk since she was arrested by immigration agents six weeks ago, and many who were watching the hearing gasped at the sight of her.

Their anxiety soon gave way to joy, as the federal judge holding the hearing 1,500 miles away in Burlington,

Vt., ruled she must be released immediately and allowed to fight her deportation proceeding from Massachusetts, where she’s spent years as a student.

Hours later, just after 5 p.m. local time, Öztürk walked out of the detention center, to the applause of dozens of supporters.

“Thank you so much for being here,” Öztürk told the crowd outside the South Louisiana ICE Processing Center before a backdrop of high fencing topped by barbed wire. She wore a light pink blouse, and had a soft smile spread across her face. “I really appreciate

OZTURK, Page A7

The center where Öztürk was held in Louisiana is surrounded by fencing and barbed wire.

Boston is ready for its star turn

Michelin Guide gives ambitious chefs something to shoot for

By Devra First
GLOBE STAFF

It’s huge news for the local dining scene: The Michelin Guide is coming to Boston. The guide, started by a French tire company more than a century ago, sends anonymous inspectors into the field to evaluate restaurants and award its rare, coveted stars.

For a long time, I did not believe that Boston should have a Michelin Guide. Which is not to say I didn’t think Boston deserved one. If I hear one more person say this is a bad restaurant town, I’m going to fling every small plate on my table at the perpetrator. There is an embarrassment of culinary talent in and around this city, which always punches above its weight. Showcase that in a guide with international reach? Sign us up.

Oh wait, we have to pay for that?

This, to me, was the rub: To get Michelin to come to a region, local tourism boards pony up substantial sums. Visit California reportedly paid Michelin $600,000 to expand its reach statewide. The Atlanta Convention and Visitors Bureau spent $1 million. Colorado tourism boards and resort companies joined forces, paying $70,000 to $100,000 each for consideration, according to The New York Times — in the process shutting out surrounding Colorado towns that were less endowed or less inclined.

A pay-to-play system can feel morally icky, favoring those with MICHELIN, Page A10

DAVID SOUTER 1939-2025

N.H. Republican who became reliable liberal vote on Supreme Court

JIM COLE/ASSOCIATED PRESS/FILE/2012

Justice Souter, who retired from the Supreme Court in 2009, was expected to be a conservative voice when he joined the court in 1990.

By David M. Shribman
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

David Hackett Souter, the Supreme Court justice at the center of preeminent legal disputes before the court and a supreme example of the rustic upcountry values of an earlier age, died Thursday. He was 85.

► New Hampshire remembers “a brilliant, thoughtful, kind, very decent person.” B3.

Justice Souter was perhaps best known as a redeemer of abortion-rights dreams and betrayer of abortion opponents’ hopes, a sometime-conservative with liberal inclinations and a sometime-liberal with conservative impulses — and above all an ascetic and intellectual.

Justice Souter, who retired from the high court in 2009, died at his home in New Hampshire, the Supreme Court said in a statement Friday. The statement did not cite a cause, saying only that he had died “peacefully.”

The most prominent — and unlikely — New Hampshire political figure since Daniel Webster and Franklin Pierce, Justice Souter was a whispery-quiet jurist, more contemplative than combative, more comfortable scaling a 4,000-foot peak in his adoptive state than in the more public settings contemporary Supreme Court justices have sought out.

He shunned frippery and pretension. “He wrote clearly for an important reason,” fellow Justice Stephen G. Breyer said in a 2021 interview. “He possessed great common sense.”

Justice Souter’s ascension to the high court, in 1990, ushered in a golden age of New England jurisprudence that exceeded the 16 years when Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. and Louis D. Brandeis served on the court together a century ago. Nominated by President George H.W. Bush, Justice Souter was followed on the court by Breyer and Elena Kagan, both of Massachusetts. The result was that for a time all the sitting justices of the

SOUTER, Page C9

Lawn more

Saturday: Warmer, rainy. High: 60-65. Low: 51-56.

Sunday: Milder, sunny. High: 67-72. Low: 46-51.

High tide: 10:53 a.m. 11 p.m.

Sunrise: 5:28 Sunset: 7:54

Comics and Weather, D4-5.

VOL. 307, NO. 130

* Suggested retail price

$4.00

