

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 24, 2025

Epstein case heightens Warren-Summers rivalry

Senator calls for Harvard to oust former president over issues of accountability

By Sam Brodey
GLOBE STAFF

When Elizabeth Warren met Larry Summers for dinner in 2009, it was something of a welcome to Washington for the ambitious progressive: an audience with President Barack Obama's top economic adviser.

Warren and Summers already had shared history as heavyweights at Harvard, where she was a star law professor and he an economics titan and former university president. Now, both were seeking to make their mark on a bigger stage: helping the nation recover from the financial crash.

But the meeting was also something of a warning. After speaking for hours, Summers told Warren she could choose to be an outsider — free to be bold but ultimately ignored — or be an insider, commanding the ears of the powerful and wielding influence, like he did.

“Insiders also understand one unbreakable rule,” Warren recalled Summers saying, in her 2014 memoir. “They don’t criticize other insiders.”

Fifteen years later, a dramatic series of developments has brought these two figures into conflict again

► Hundreds of Trump mentions in latest Epstein documents. A2.
► Summers further tied in. B2.

— casting Summers’ past warning in a resonant new dimension.

New emails released by federal lawmakers have brought renewed scrutiny on Summers’ cozy relationship with Jeffrey Epstein, the late disgraced financier and convicted sex offender who has come to symbolize the darkest aspects of the rich

WARREN-SUMMERS, Page A5

High court strikes blow to Trump on Guard

Won’t allow use of troops in Chicago, potentially affecting other cities

By Ann E. Marimow
NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Tuesday refused to allow President Trump to deploy hundreds of National Guard troops in the Chicago area over the objection of Illinois officials, casting doubt on the viability of similar deployments in other cities.

The justices’ order is preliminary, but it blocks the Trump administration for now from ordering the state-based military force to the Chicago area, where an immigration crackdown led to thousands of arrests and confrontations between residents and federal agents.

In its three-page unsigned ruling against the administration, the court refused to grant the president broad discretion to deploy the military in cities, citing an 1878 law, which bans the use of the military for domestic policing. It represented a rare departure from recent cases, in which the conservative majority has overwhelmingly sided with Trump in preliminary tests of presidential power.

At this stage in the litigation, the court said the Trump administration had not shown that the statute at issue “permits the president to federalize the Guard in the exercise of inherent authority to protect federal personnel and property in Illinois.”

Three conservative justices — Clarence Thomas, Samuel Alito Jr., and Neil Gorsuch — noted their objections in lengthy dissents, with Alito writing that “the protection of federal officers from potentially lethal attacks should not be thwarted.”

In response to the ruling, Abigail Jackson, a

NATIONAL GUARD, Page A4

PHOTOS BY MATTHEW CAVANAUGH FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

Shayne Lahousse of Cumberland, R.I., was joined by her 2-year-old daughter, Noa, at the Yankee Candle in South Deerfield.

Keeping the flame burning

Yankee Candle faces a number of struggles but the old magic lives on at flagship store

By Brooke Hauser
GLOBE STAFF

SOUTH DEERFIELD — It might seem like the world is falling apart sometimes, but there is one place where “it’s always Christmas,” just like the sign says, and that’s the scented-candle flagship store known as Yankee Candle Village.

People come to this German-themed tourist destination year-round to see the Black Forest where it snows every four minutes, stroll around the Bavarian Village with its 25-foot Christmas tree, and buy everything from ornaments to fudge.

Mostly, though, they come to sniff wax.

Revisiting beloved scents, like

Macayla Hanscom of Hadley (center) and her sister Christina Gray of Granby experienced the scents.

Balsam & Cedar or Christmas Cookie, inevitably inspires customers to share memories in the middle of the shopping aisle, a throwback to the 1990s when Yankee Candle was a popular fixture in malls around the country. But now, with slumping sales, impending store closures and layoffs, and a saturated fragrant-candle market, the smell of decline is creeping in.

In mid-December, shoppers were mostly unaware of any troubling news as they perused the megastore, aka the Scenter of the Universe. Some were casual, taking a whiff here and there. Others brought the seriousness of a sommelier, sticking their noses into

CANDLES, Page A7

In still-shaken Providence, quiet signs of normalcy

By Alexa Gagosz, Christopher Gavin, Camilo Fonseca, and Steph Machado
GLOBE STAFF

PROVIDENCE — When Julia Menendez walked back into work last weekend, it was hard just to cross the threshold.

Menendez, who works at Dune Brothers on Ives Street, not far from Brown University, was uneasy returning to the restaurant. “Looking at the same spot where we were hiding in the dark for hours — it didn’t feel right to be here.”

Menendez was working the night of Dec. 13 when a gunman opened fire inside Brown’s Barus and Holley engineering and physics building, killing two students and injuring nine others. A sous chef received a phone call warning of an active shooter. The restaurant’s owner instructed staff by phone to lock the doors.

Her voice shaking, Menendez recalled ushering a restaurant full of customers into a windowless room ordinarily used to filet fish. Then she turned off the lights in the dining room, its windows overlooking the street, and she and the rest of the staff huddled on the kitchen floor, sheltering in place for hours.

Now, even with the gunman dead, “I’m still looking over my shoulder, just not as much,” Menendez said. “I don’t know when that will go away.”

More than 10 days after the shooting that shattered the sense of safety around Brown, Prov-

PROVIDENCE, Page A10

VOL. 308, NO. 177

Suggested retail price
$4.00

The Trump administration will begin to garnish the pay of some student loan borrowers soon. A4.

The MBTA is accused of violating bidding laws in an effort to revamp its Foxborough commuter rail station ahead of next year’s World Cup. B1.

Governor Maura Healey said she would vote against a proposal for statewide rent control, saying it would harm housing production. B1.

Furniture retailer Circle Furniture is closing all of its stores after more than 70 years in business. B5.

It’s time to look back on the year in restaurants, and Devra First has her delicious dozen. G1.

Let it blow

Wednesday: Windy, flurries. High 37-42. Low 25-30.

Thursday: Cloudy, cool. High 37-42. Low 13-18.

Sunrise: 7:11 Sunset: 4:16

Weather and Comics, G6-7.

SCAN TO DONATE
VIA VENMO

SCAN TO DONATE AT GLOBESANTA.ORG

Globe Santa
70 Years of Giving

STILL TIME LEFT TO DONATE
HELP GLOBE SANTA BRING BOOKS & TOYS TO KIDS IN NEED