

Ed Miliband belongs in a padded cell but this Net Zero nutjob has got the British people in a straitjacket

LITTLEJOHN

SEE PAGE 17

NHS FAT JABS AT THE PHARMACY

Patients to get weight-loss drugs on prescription from chemists without seeing doctor in plan to tackle obesity

EXCLUSIVE

By Chris Pollard

PHARMACISTS are set to hand out weight-loss jabs on the NHS.

Under government plans, just a short, over-the-counter consultation will be needed to get the likes of Ozempic and Mounjaro for the cost of an NHS prescription – this week frozen at £9.90.

The Mail understands a deal worth tens of millions of pounds will be struck with a major pharmaceutical firm to fund a pilot scheme across the UK, with a view to eventually rolling it out to everyone in need.

At the moment, the powerful injections are available to only a tiny number of people on the NHS – after talks with a specialist and in conjunction with other weight-loss methods. There is a two-year waiting list.

But ministers plan to expand the drugs' use dramatically by dishing out prescriptions quickly and easily in 'creative' ways, such as through high street chemists, health centres and apps.

It means, once the deal is signed, it will be possible to walk into a pharmacy and, after a short assessment, leave with a supply of jabs for £9.90.

A source said: 'People with resources are already buying them privately, but we know there are people from certain backgrounds

On the hottest May Day ever, who's the TV star getting a soaking?

SEE PAGES 2-3