

JAKE MICHAELS FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

A Return to Form
The Los Angeles County Museum of Art’s new home opens soon, and our critic Michael Kimmelman is impressed. Page C1.

In Confronting Another Pope, Trump Finds a Harder Target

By ELIZABETH DIAS and MOTOKO RICH
WASHINGTON — Donald Trump ascended to office 10 years ago while publicly jousting with Pope Francis, who was routinely making headlines for the progressive Catholicism he elevated, pushing the Roman Catholic Church to focus on climate change and the rights of immigrants. The pope suggested that Mr. Trump was “not Christian”; Mr. Trump fired back that Francis was “disgraceful.”
Mr. Trump capitalized on growing discontent among conservative Christians and won the White House. The chasm only further widened between the Vatican and conservative American Catholics, who often saw in Mr. Trump a champion.

Pope Leo XIV, who was elected less than a year ago, is not Francis. For Mr. Trump, who is now in his second term, he presents a new foil at the Vatican with a markedly different standing among Catholics. As the first American in the seat of St. Peter, he has a native fluency in American politics and culture, and his leadership is supported across

Continued on Page A10

Rare Israel and Lebanon Talks Focus on Curtailing Hezbollah

This article is by Michael Crowley, Euan Ward, Anushka Patil and Thomas Fuller.
WASHINGTON — Israeli and Lebanese officials held their first direct talks in decades on Tuesday, meeting in Washington to try to end a bloody conflict that has threatened to derail the broader cease-fire in the war between Iran and the United States.
“We understand we’re working against decades of history,” said Secretary of State Marco Rubio, who was involved in the talks.
Mr. Rubio said the negotiations had the ambitious goal of trying to bring “a permanent end to 20 or 30 years of Hezbollah influence in this part of the world.” Hezbollah, the Lebanese-based militant group allied with Iran, is not a part of the talks and has long opposed direct negotiations with Israel.

After a meeting that lasted more than two hours, Israel’s representative at the talks, Yechiel Leiter, said the two countries were “on the same side of the equation” and described the meeting as the “beginning” of an effort to defeat

Continued on Page A9

WARNING The war in Iran could slow growth, the International Monetary Fund projected. PAGE B1

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ERIN SCHAFF/THE NEW YORK TIMES

A Child Care Crisis
With cuts closing centers, parents are facing hard choices. Above, the teacher Jovanna Perez at her day care on its last day. Page A12.

A Police Chief’s $4.5 Million Gambling Secret: ‘It’s on the App’

By HURUBIE MEKO
NEW HAVEN, Conn. — Karl R. Jacobson had what seemed like a model law enforcement career. He rose through the ranks of the Police Department in New Haven, Conn., to become the police chief in 2022, around the same time he earned his master’s degree in criminal justice.
As he completed what appeared to be a successful first term, he was on the cusp of reappointment. But those who worked closest to him had started spotting red flags.

In December, Mr. Jacobson asked one of his lieutenants for a $500 loan. He took money set aside to pay informants and left behind an I.O.U. note. A department account he controlled was empty.
Three of his deputies con-

A Spotlight on the Risks of Online Betting fronted him in January. When they gathered in Mr. Jacobson’s office, he explained that he was addicted to gambling. The deputies were confused. They had “never seen him gambling,” one said, according to an arrest warrant.

Mr. Jacobson tapped his phone on a conference table. “It’s on the app,” he said. In a year he had wagered about $4.46 million on DraftKings and FanDuel accounts, two of the nation’s leading online sports betting sites, according to investigators.
He retired within hours. A little

Continued on Page A20

Split U.S. Comes to Grips With a Largely Hazy War

Past Conflicts Add to Frustration Over Iran

This article is by Jack Healy, Pooja Salhotra, Jazmine Ulloa, Anna Griffin, Emily Cataneo and Ruth Igielnik.
Krystal Zimmerman, an Army veteran who fought in Iraq, is worried about America’s latest war in the Middle East. She supported attacking Iran’s nuclear sites, but as the conflict lurches from bombings and threats of annihilation to a shaky truce with no clear exit, she worries that President Trump has now stumbled into his own forever war.
“It’s a waste of resources, a waste of money, and we come off as bullies,” Ms. Zimmerman, 40, said after she wrapped up a recent appointment at a Veterans Affairs clinic in Colorado Springs, where she receives treatment for the depression and sleeplessness that followed her home from Baghdad.
Many Americans are expressing anger, frustration, even bewilderment as the war on Iran grinds into its seventh week. Over the weekend, peace talks fizzled, and Mr. Trump reverted to bombast and conflicting statements as he ordered a blockade of Iranian ports to counter Iran’s closure of the Strait of Hormuz.
Public-opinion surveys show that roughly six in 10 Americans oppose the U.S.-led war against Iran, a striking shift from the solid public support that accompanied the United States’ invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan in the early 2000s, or the Persian Gulf war in the 1990s. Some say they are simply baffled by a war that they feel the president did not prepare them for and that still has not been clearly explained.
“I don’t think Trump is making wise decisions,” Emmelia Lorenzen, 19, said as she and a friend sipped coffees in Fayetteville, N.C., home to the sprawling Fort Bragg Army base, which serves as headquarters to both Army Special Operations and the Third Special Forces Group.

But it has been a muted opposition, unfurling in conversations at cafes and veterans’ halls, and prompting smaller demonstrations instead of the huge protests that accompanied the Vietnam War or the run-up to the 2003 invasion of Iraq.
“I’m incredulous that more people aren’t in the streets, but yeah, it’s kind of hard to be surprised or even shocked by anything he does now,” Mike Keefe, 64, said of the president as he stood with a diminished cluster of protesters outside an immigration detention center in Portland, Ore.
The opposition to the Iran war splits largely along party lines. Democratic voters overwhelmingly oppose the war, while most Republican voters back the president, according to a survey conducted by Pew Research Center before the recent cease-fire.
But in a sign of potential trouble for President Trump and Republicans fighting to keep control of Congress, the Pew survey also found that independent voters who lean toward the Republican Party were more closely divided, with 52 percent saying they approved of how Mr. Trump was handling the war and 45 percent saying they disapproved.
Fissures within the Republican Party are primarily coming from outside of Mr. Trump’s core base,

Continued on Page A14

Hochul Eyeing New Tax in City On 2nd Homes

By BENJAMIN ORESKES
ALBANY, N.Y. — As New York leaders argue over whether to raise taxes on high earners to help solve New York City’s multi-billion-dollar budget gap, Gov. Kathy Hochul has decided to push for a so-called pied-à-terre tax aimed at the ultrawealthy who primarily live outside the city.
Ms. Hochul will formally propose a yearly tax surcharge on second homes in New York City that are worth $5 million or more, she said on Tuesday.
The exact cost of the surcharge has not yet been ironed out, but the governor hopes to raise $500 million that would be used to address New York City’s deficit, estimated at $5.4 billion through the next fiscal year.

“New York City is the greatest city in the world, and the people who call it home should not be left carrying the burden alone,” Ms. Hochul said in a written statement. “If you can afford a $5 million second home that sits empty most of the year, you can afford to contribute like every other New Yorker.”
Aides to Ms. Hochul said that the surcharge would potentially involve a sliding scale, with properties of higher value being taxed at a higher rate. The governor intends to include the surcharge in the state’s multibillion-dollar budget, which was due April 1 and is still being negotiated with state legislative leaders.
Ms. Hochul has generally resisted calls, led by Mayor Zohran Mamdani of New York City, to raise taxes on large corporations or on high earners. But a tax on multimillion-dollar second homes was more palatable to her, according to her aides, since it mostly

Continued on Page A19

KRISTIAN THACKER FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

An A.I.-powered drone at a factory near Columbus, Ohio.

A Global Race For Arsenals Of A.I. Drones

This article is by Sheera Frenkel, Paul Mozur and Adam Satariano.
At a military parade in Beijing in September, President Xi Jinping and his special guests, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia and the North Korean leader, Kim Jong-un, watched as Chinese forces showed off several models of drones that could autonomously fly alongside fighter jets into battle.
The demonstration of technological might immediately set off alarm bells in the United States. Pentagon officials concluded that America’s program for combat drones was lagging China’s, according to three U.S. defense and intelligence officials. Russia, too, was thought to be ahead in building facilities that could produce advanced drones, said the officials, who were not authorized to speak publicly on military capabilities.
U.S. officials pushed domestic defense companies to step up. Last month, Anduril, a defense technology start-up in California, began manufacturing A.I.

Continued on Page A11

Pulled From Brink of Collapse
Denmark is aiding Mykolaiv, Ukraine, as the Trump administration pushes a more business-focused plan. PAGE A4

Carney Seals a Majority
The Canadian leader’s remaking of the Liberal Party leaves him unmatched in domestic power. News Analysis. PAGE A7

NATIONAL A12-20
A Fight for the Youth Vote
A wide range of groups are competing against Turning Point USA on college campuses in what will be the first election since Charlie Kirk’s death. PAGE A13
Bessent Shrugs Off Science
The Treasury secretary said it was “difficult to deconstruct” the reasons for global warming. PAGE A19
OBITUARIES B11-12
Creator of Zany Television
Sid Krofft, with his brother Marty, was behind shows like “H.R. Pufnstuf” and “Land of the Lost.” He was 96. PAGE B12

BUSINESS B1-5
Fast-Food Fight Over Drinks
McDonald’s is adding fruit-flavored cold beverages to compete with chains like Dunkin’ and Starbucks. PAGE B1
Examining A.I. Overviews
Google’s answers look authoritative, but they draw on sources from trustworthy sites to Facebook posts. PAGE B1

SPORTS B6-10
Next-Generation Shortstops
A stellar crop of eye-popping phenoms is hitting the major leagues, driven by talent and by structural factors keeping them at the position. PAGE B6
ARTS C1-6
Lives of the Artists
The actors Ian McKellen, 86, and Michaela Coel, 38, star together in “The Christophers,” Steven Soderbergh’s new movie about fine art. PAGE C1
OPINION A22-23
The Editorial Board PAGE A22

FOOD D1-8
Big-Money Bets on Bagels
Exceptional bagels were once found only in a few major cities. Some investors are determined to make them a nationwide phenomenon. PAGE D8

