JERUSALEM — As the United States and Israel pounded Iran from land and sea for a second day, a defiant Iranian regime unleashed deadly retaliatory strikes across the Middle East on Sunday, amid fears of a wider, protracted conflagration.

Three US troops were killed in Kuwait, the Pentagon said Sunday, the first Americans to die in President Trump's high-stakes war with Iran. And at least nine people were killed in a small Israeli city near Jerusalem. Explosions resounded in Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Oman, and the United Arab Emirates, killing at least four people, as local air defenses sought to repel Iranian drones.

A day after Iranian media confirmed that the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, was among many top officials killed in an airstrike, Iran's top national security official, Ali Larijani, announced that an interim committee would run the country until a successor to the ayatollah was chosen.

Larijani also said the supreme leader's death would not deter Iran, which he said would hit Israeli and American targets "with a force they have never experienced before."

CIA helped pinpoint ayatollah; Israel struck

WASHINGTON — Shortly before the United States and Israel were poised to launch an attack on Iran, the CIA zeroed in on the location of Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the country's supreme leader.

The CIA had been tracking Khamenei for months, gaining more confidence about his locations and his patterns, according to people familiar with the operation. Then the agency learned that a meeting of top Iranian officials would take place Saturday morning at a leadership compound in the heart of Tehran. Most critically, the CIA learned that the supreme leader would be at the site.

The United States and Israel decided to adjust the timing of their attack, in part to take advantage of the new intelligence, according to officials with knowledge

No more a shining symbol of city's revival, mall faces dimming future

Vacancies mount at debt-ridden Providence Place as sale looms

PROVIDENCE — Inside the former Tiffany & Co. store at the heart of the massive downtown Providence Place mall, the jewelry cases remain illuminated, but empty. Dust clings to the glass shelves where diamonds once sparkled. There isn't a little blue box in sight.

The darkened first-floor storefront has been vacant for more than a year. Just two doors down, customers line up at a thriving Apple Store for iPhones and laptop repairs. Across the hall, two other stores are empty: Banana Republic and Swarovski Crystal closed in January. Farther down, teens crowd into Pop Mart for Labubus beside another empty storefront.

It's a portrait of a mall in limbo. After the owners defaulted on $259 million in debt, the Providence Place is in receivership and headed for sale. Nearly three decades after it opened as a bet on downtown, luxury brands are retreating and vacancies are mounting. The question is not which store will close

Dartmouth's push to adopt AI confronts reality check

Critics fear rollout's effect on close-knit culture

HANOVER, N.H. — Students and professors debating whether they should use artificial intelligence for class assignments. Faculty mobilizing against a partnership with an AI company that allegedly lifted 500,000 books from authors — including many of them. School officials under fire for paying an undergraduate to promote a mental health chatbot in the student newspaper.

Welcome to AI's rollout on a big-time campus. Dartmouth College has moved faster and more aggressively than the rest of the Ivy League and most other elite colleges in embracing AI, as university leaders push to adopt the technology for classes, research, and training. But even as generative AI disrupts higher education nationwide, the swift rollout at Dartmouth is a singular example of the turbulence that the rapidly evolving technology can bring.

Dartmouth leaders are not mandating the use of AI, yet critics on campus say they've had little opportunity to adapt to what they see as a massive change to how the college works. At stake, they say, is the tight-knit academic culture Dartmouth has nurtured in rural New Hampshire over nearly three centuries as a school that focuses on the liberal arts, with a small student body and deeply personal style of instruction. It's the only Ivy League institution with "college," rather than "university," in its name.

Candidates see parenting as way to grasp economic woes

Patrick Roath wants you to know that he's running for Congress. He also wants you to know he just became a dad.

The Boston attorney, who learned he and his wife were expecting his first child just before announcing his candidacy, has already put his identity as a new parent at the center of his bid to unseat US Representative Stephen Lynch. In December, immediately after his daughter was born, Roath laid out a plan to lower the cost of child care — a core message for a campaign pitching solutions for the high cost of living and generational change.

"No matter what room I'm in, heads nod when you talk about" child care costs, Roath, 38, said in an interview. "I'm out there talking about the need to rebuild confidence in our democracy and ... learning I was going to have a daughter made that more acute in the sense that I'm worried about what we're going to pass on to her generation."

That message is growing more common among Democratic candidates, especially younger ones
