What if AI could hire you, train you — and even suggest when you need a break from work? A new study from Abu Dhabi's Department of Government Enablement (DGE) says that's exactly where the future of work is headed. By 2040, the way we get hired, work, and grow in our careers could look completely different — and AI will play a starring role. The Emerging Trends Report in Talent Management (2024–2040) maps 16 big trends set to reshape how governments and companies man-

WHAT AI CAN DO

- Recommend personalised wellness plans
- Help you switch careers
- Assign you to the perfect team using data
- Predict if you're thinking of quitting

age people — from AI-led hiring and training to team structures where there are no “bosses,” just self-managed groups.

Science fiction no more

You might soon see game-like work setups, complete with leaderboards and badges to boost performance. Or use virtual reality headsets to learn a new skill. This idea isn't science fiction — DGE is already using AI to track employee development, reduce resignations, and design smarter career paths within Abu Dhabi's public sector.

“The real work lies in building systems that prepare our people for what's next,” said Ruba Yousef Al Hassan, Director General of Strategic Affairs and Future Foresight at DGE.

From the AI Accelerator Programme to AI-powered planning tools, Abu Dhabi is applying these ideas now — making sure its government teams are ready for the future. One tool even helps align goals across departments more clearly and quickly, cutting down on endless meetings and confusion.

How does this report signal a big shift for you? Your next job might not care much about your university degree — but will care a lot about your skills. You might work with AI every day. For UAE residents, especially in public sector or tech, this is a strong hint: now's the time to learn, upskill, and stay future-ready.

US court blocks tariffs in major blow to Trump

UAE FIRMS INVOLVED IN EXPORTS TO US WILL FIND FEWER BARRIERS NOW

A major US trade court has blocked most of the global tariffs imposed by President Donald Trump — calling them unlawful. While the legal battle is far from over, this decision has already begun to ripple across world markets and could reshape global trade dynamics.

The ruling is a major blow to Trump's trade strategy, which aimed to pressure foreign governments through aggressive import levies. The Court of International Trade found the tariffs unjustified despite Trump citing trade deficits and drug imports as a national emergency. The White House has 10 days to begin rolling back the duties and has already filed an appeal.

Here's what investors, business owners, and consumers across the world and the UAE should know — and why it matters.

Permanently blocked?

These tariffs were applied to a wide range of goods under the claim of national emergencies — such as trade deficits or drug trafficking. But the court said these reasons didn't legally justify such sweeping trade measures. So unless a higher court overturns the decision, these tariffs are now permanently blocked.

Companies in the UAE involved in exports to the US could find fewer barriers if such broad tariffs are permanently struck down. This may especially help businesses in sectors like metals,

CHINESE STUDENTS' VISAS TO BE REVOKED

The US plans to start “aggressively” revoking visas for Chinese students, Secretary of State Marco Rubio said, escalating the Trump administration's push for greater scrutiny of foreigners attending American universities.

Rubio said in a statement that students affected would include “those with connections to the Chinese Communist Party or studying in critical fields.”

The US will also enhance scrutiny “of all future visa applications from the People's Republic of China and Hong Kong,” he added.

Beijing criticised the US' decision to “unreasonably” revoke the visas of Chinese students, saying yesterday it had lodged protests with Washington.
