A Sucker Punch Launched Trump's War on Colleges

Harmeet Dhillon, head of the civil-rights division at the Justice Department, wakes up around 6 a.m. and begins her workday scrolling through X, searching for claims of discrimination.

By Eliza Collins, Douglas Belkin, Tarini Parti and Liz Essley Whyte

A lot of them, Dhillon said, regard universities. After spotting "a list of new horrors," she said, "I text my deputies, and we assign cases, and we get cranking." The Trump administration is on the hunt for campuses that have allegedly tolerated antisemitism, threatening to yank billions of dollars in federal research funding from Harvard and other top-name schools. The White House has accused universities of failing to protect Jewish students during campus protests against Israel over the war in Gaza that began in 2023. Yet the idea of targeting elite schools by withholding federal funds originated years earlier. Conservatives have long studied ways to combat what they view as the liberal, anti-Western ills of American higher education. Some are now in the Trump administration, trying to push change. While Dhillon was a student at Dartmouth College, she was editor in chief of a conservative college newspaper that sued the school in a free-speech case. She said the lawsuit, which got students reinstated, cemented her career path. In 2018, she was the lawyer on a lawsuit that forced the University of California, Berkeley to revamp its speaker policies. Trump has since become preoccupied with the White House push—headed by Stephen Miller, the president's top domestic policy adviser—to influence U.S. universities, particularly Harvard, according to administration officials. A federal judge on Thursday kept in place a temporary stop to administration efforts to forbid international students from enrolling at the

Appeals Court Lets Tariffs Stand for Now

Decision invalidating levies is temporarily paused as Trump appeals the ruling

A federal appeals court temporarily put on hold a ruling that voided President Trump's tariffs while it considers the administration's challenge to the lower-court decision.

By Jan Wolfe, Alex Leary and Jason Douglas

In a brief order on Thursday, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit said it was pausing Wednesday's decision from the U.S. Court of International Trade until it can hear further legal arguments.

The order, known as an administrative stay, didn't rule on the merits of the litigation. Administrative stays are common in emergency appeals.

The Federal Circuit, an intermediate appeals court in Washington, D.C., signaled it was prepared to move swiftly on the case, as the Trump administration urged it to do. It asked a group of companies that challenged the tariffs to file a brief before June 5 laying out their arguments and directed the Justice Department to reply by June 9. The order indicates the appeal will be heard by the full court, with 11 active judges participating. The appeals court's move came as the Trump administration scrambled in search of a stay on the tariff ruling, which Justice Department lawyers said was "rife with legal error and upends President Trump's efforts to eliminate our exploding trade deficit and reorient the global economy on an equal footing," according to a filing

White House Devises Plan B on Trade Policy

By Gavin Bade and Kim Mackrael

WASHINGTON—President Trump's trade team is readying its Plan B. The administration's tariff strategy was undermined when a court this week found it was illegal for Trump to impose sweeping duties by using emergency economic powers. A federal court on Thursday allowed his duties to stay in effect while the administration's appeal moves forward, but U.S. officials are weighing their options should they need to find a new legal authority to impose the president's steep tariffs, which he argues will help rebalance trade in the U.S.'s favor. The potential pivot reflects the challenges to Trump's aggressive trade policy, which relied on a novel interpretation of trade law. Typically, tariffs are imposed using targeted authority delegated to the president by Congress, but Trump's team had relied on little-used emergency powers to quickly impose the bulk of his wide-ranging second-term tariffs. With that strategy under threat, the president's team is weighing a twofold response, according to people familiar with the matter. First, the administration is considering a stopgap effort to impose tariffs on swaths of the global economy under a never-before-used provision of the Trade Act of 1974, which includes language allowing for tariffs of up to 15% for 150 days to address trade imbalances with other countries, the people said. That would then buy time for Trump to devise individualized tariffs for each major trading partner under a different provision of

Musk, Leaving DOGE, Returns To His Bruised Business Empire

By Becky Peterson and Micah Maidenber

Elon Musk is ready to get obsessed with his companies again. He has a lot to contend with. Tesla is about to launch its first robotaxis, SpaceX is trying to launch a spacecraft to Mars, and xAI is racing to develop human-level artificial intelligence before the competition does it first. "Back to spending 24/7 at work and sleeping in conference/server/factory rooms," he posted on X Saturday. "I must be super focused on xAI and Tesla (plus Starship launch next week)." Musk is known for maniacal focus on whatever is in front of him, and for years has carved up his time to try to advance difficult technologies across his business empire. The companies he is returning to are still wrestling with those kinds of heady challenges, but now must do so with Musk transformed into a deeply polarizing figure. At SpaceX's Starship launch earlier this week, he appeared locked into mission details, wearing his trusty "Occupy Mars" shirt during interviews and when he was in a company flight-control facility near Brownsville, Texas. There was no "Make America Great Again" hat in sight. On Wednesday evening, Musk said he was stepping down from his work with DOGE, a four-month project to slash government spending that promised as much as $2 trillion in cuts and, in reality,

Celebrities Steal the Show in the Knicks' Playoff Run

The basketball may be good, but the sidelines are even better

By Sam Schube

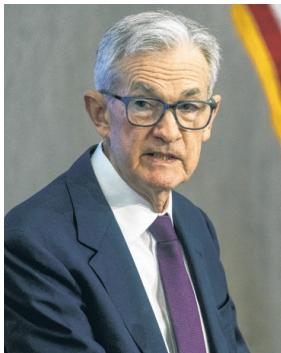

Here's Timothée Chalamet, making a rare public appearance with Kylie Jenner. There's Kylie's sister Kendall, bumping into her former flame Bad Bunny. Make way for Cardi B and Stefon Diggs, seemingly announcing a new romance to the world. It's not the Oscars, or the Golden Globes, or even a house party in the Hollywood Hills. It's "Celebrity Row" at Madison Square Garden, where, deep into a Knicks playoff run, the A-listers are running amok.

Oh, yeah, and there's basketball, too: The Knicks have been playing the Indiana Pacers in the Eastern Conference Finals. But you'd be forgiven for taking your eye off the ball. Because on the sidelines, relationships have been launched. Gossip has been spread. Memes have been made. And one star has rocketed up the celebrity-fan leaderboard. The real action may be on the court. But during the playoffs, Celebrity Row has been a stage all its own. Even when the Knicks are bad—which they have been for most of this century—they draw a famous crowd. Spike Lee is perhaps the team's most prominent superfan. "A Knicks ticket has always been the hottest ticket in town," said Madeline Hill, who co-hosts a sports gossip podcast. "But for celebrities and public figures, getting invited to sit
