The Golden Quay to Abu Dhabi initiative, offering yacht owners the possibility of securing a 10-year UAE Golden Visa, has attracted attention from investors, especially in the yachting industry.

The scheme, a partnership between Abu Dhabi's Department of Culture and Tourism, the Abu Dhabi Investment Office, and Yas Marina, aims to encourage high-net-worth individuals to settle in the UAE.

However, while the Golden Visa concept has brought about a general positive shift for yacht sales, it hasn't yet resulted in a significant spike in boat purchases, according to experts at the Dubai International Boat Show. Abeer Al Shaali, Deputy Managing Director of Gulf Craft, emphasised that the Golden Visa scheme has created an environment conducive to yacht ownership. She noted that owning a yacht is integral to the broader experience of settling in the UAE, but the immediate impact on boat sales is minimal to date.

Despite this, yacht sales in the UAE have seen a slight downturn in recent years, as reflected by data from the State of Yachting report. Nevertheless, the market shows signs of stability, and with upcoming yacht exhibitions and product launches, experts forecast robust sales by 2025.

Positive outlook

Gulf Craft, for instance, is positive about its prospects, with a strong order book and new models on display at the event. The continued growth of the UAE's maritime sector, alongside the evolving residency options for yacht owners, signals a promising future for the yachting industry, even amid global uncertainties. Whether Dubai will introduce a similar Golden Visa programme remains uncertain, but the market trend suggests a growing commitment to attracting investors.
