Polling’s Wild West Landscape Makes for Campaign Confusion

Bad Surveys and Betting Odds Before November

By REID J. EPSTEIN

WASHINGTON — When Mandela Barnes dropped out of the Wisconsin governor’s race two weeks before the Democratic primary, he declared, “It has become very clear who our nominee is going to be.”

He meant Francesca Hong, who had a commanding lead in polls — not David Crowley, who ended up narrowly winning the nomination.

Politicians like Mr. Barnes have relied on public and private surveys of voters’ views to guide their decisions for as long as pollsters have sought to measure public opinion. But in this year’s midterm contests, misleading polling has shaped campaign narratives, donor behavior and news coverage like never before.

Polls are traditionally used to measure public opinion, not mold it. But this year, several Democratic campaigns have seized on unreliable polls to push the perception that their candidates are surging to try to solidify support, attract donors and scare off rivals. The rise of prediction markets has also created financial incentives for untrustworthy or even fake political polls at a moment when it has become even more expensive and difficult to conduct high-quality public opinion surveys.

Some Republicans — particularly President Trump — have for years pointed to dubious polling to advance their political goals, but the phenomenon has become far more acute in Democratic primaries this year. In recent weeks, questionable surveys have created confusion and warped perceptions of the results of key primaries for the party.

In Michigan’s primary for Senate, polls fueled a widespread belief that Representative Haley Stevens, a moderate Democrat, was a major underdog to Dr. Abdul El-Sayed, a progressive. After she voted on Primary Day, the Buenos Aires — Dancing, beating his chest and hugging Flávio Bolsonaro, the right-wing candidate seeking to become Brazil’s next leader, President Javier Milei of Argentina launched into a tirade against Brazil’s current president, calling him a “thief” and “socialist trash.”

Mr. Milei was seeking to aid Mr. Bolsonaro, who is running against President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva in this October’s election, but that brash display of camaraderie in São Paulo came with consequences. After the event last month, Brazil recalled its ambassador to Argentina, generating the most serious rift in decades between South America’s two largest economies.

The episode was only the latest example of the personal alliances and international endorsements reshaping Latin American politics, as right-wing candidates win elections across the region.

Sharing hard-line policy proposals, campaign mascots and videos of themselves together, they are sending a message of right-wing unity. And, borrowing heavily from President Trump’s playbook, they are openly stepping into neighbors’ elections.

The ascent of right-wing leaders comes as many Latin American voters are frustrated with soaring crime and insecurity, and with what they see as left-wing leaders’ failure to deal with these and other issues, including the economy and immigration.

Like-minded leaders banding together is nothing new on the right or the left, as in the long alliance between Venezuela and Cuba. But this new crop of conservative leaders — many of them political newcomers — is promoting

Fury Over Data Centers Quickly Shifts Midterms

By SHANE GOLDMACHER

The fight over data centers is suddenly at the epicenter of the midterm elections.

One new ad in Texas begins with someone typing into a chatbot, “Why is my electric bill going up?” Another in Ohio blames one of the state’s Republican senators for a proliferation of data centers, calling them “a total scam.” And in top House battlegrounds in Michigan, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania, the Democratic challengers are all running ads against the server warehouses powering the arti-cial intelligence boom.

Data centers have become unlikely fault lines in the broader fight over an A.I. revolution that is remaking the global economy and threatening to disrupt the job market. Now politicians are racing to tap into the backlash — or inoculate themselves — as political strategists in both parties described the issue as an unusually fast-moving force that is already reshaping races for the House, the Senate and governors’ mansions.

“It’s very much a bottom-up, organic movement,” said Anna Greenberg, a veteran Democratic pollster, who said that while people’s views on data centers were largely tied to how close they live

In Panettiere’s Final Year, Debilitating Pain and Trouble With Ex

and MATT STEVENS

This spring, Hayden Panettiere began a book tour at a Barnes & Noble in Manhattan, greeting fans with a bright smile before steeling herself for a discussion about a memoir that chronicles the trials of her life, including struggles with drug and alcohol addiction and an abusive ex-boyfriend.

Before the event in May, the bookstore was given a specific instruction, according to two people with direct knowledge of the tour: Do not let in a man named Brian Hickerson.

Mr. Hickerson was the former boyfriend Ms. Panettiere had discussed at length in her memoir, which recounted his violence against her that had resulted in three arrests and a stint in jail.

They eventually resumed a tumultuous on-and-off relationship.

Estranged From Family and Racked by Grief

But by the time of the book tour, she was accompanied by private security with clear instructions to keep him away, according to the two people.

“I needed an incredible amount of support and backup in order to make sure that there was no way for him to find his way back in,” Ms. Panettiere said on a podcast in May.

Three months later, Mr. Hickerson was present when she was pronounced dead in an apartment complex in Greenville, S.C. The police have said there were no signs of foul play, and neither Mr. Hickerson nor his brother Zach, who are listed in a police report as

IRAN THREATENS U.S. GULF ALLIES IN ECONOMIC WAR

VOW TO BLOCK ALL OIL

White House to Outline Plan as Tehran Takes Unyielding Stance

By ERIKA SOLOMON

President Trump has warned that “Economic D-Day” is coming for Iran. Over the weekend, Tehran promised to fight back, threatening any nation that helps the United States.

Iran’s new security chief, Mohsen Rezaei, on Saturday vowed to strike the interests of oil-rich neighbors if they joined U.S. efforts to further isolate Iran, whose economy is already in free fall. He warned that Tehran would seek to prevent “even a single drop of oil” from leaving the region.

“Any country that becomes a partner in creating economic restrictions against us will be regarded by us as an enemy,” he said in an interview with Iran’s state broadcaster.

Mr. Rezaei is a political hard-liner and former head of the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps. The interview offered his first extensive comments since taking up his post two weeks ago — and struck an aggressive tone in line with Iran’s increasingly uncompromising regional strategy. At one point, he asked whether Iran should pursue building a nuclear bomb, which Tehran has previously insisted it had no intention of doing.

Iran’s new leaders, who replaced comparatively more cautious figures killed by the U.S. and Israeli bombardment this year, are “changing the deterrence equation from purely defensive measures to an offensive approach in all spheres,” including the economy, said Mohammad Ghaderi, a Tehran-based foreign affairs expert.

“Tehran is seeking to impose greater costs on the United States and its allies,” Mr. Ghaderi said. “This conveys the message that the cost of continuing hostility toward Iran will have far more extensive consequences for Washington and its allies than in the past.”

Though active military hostilities have ebbed, Iran and the United States remain locked in an economic standoff. Mr. Trump, who imposed a naval blockade of Iran, has now threatened “tremendous economic consequences” on any nation doing business with Tehran. His treasury secretary, Scott Bessent, was expected to announce the U.S. economic plan against Iran on Monday.

Iran is continuing to disrupt the global economy by blocking traffic through the Strait of Hormuz, a vital waterway for oil and gas exports from the Persian Gulf. It refuses to relent until a deal is reached with Washington that offers it access to frozen assets and relief from the sanctions Mr. Trump now looks set to try to expand.
