

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

MONDAY, APRIL 14, 2025

When classrooms become a place of peril

As attacks on teachers rise, officials look for solutions to safeguard schools for all

By James Vaznis
GLOBE STAFF

It was the type of reaction Maya Jones increasingly feared might happen when she asked an eighth-grade student, who was rolling her eyes and goofing off, to pay attention during class in October at the Tobin K-8 School in Roxbury.

The girl, whose behavior had been raising concerns with Jones, cursed at her repeatedly and threatened to harm her. Jones attempted to calm her down, but then asked her to leave the classroom. The girl refused.

Instead, the student slammed her Chromebook down on her desk, walked up to Jones, and started punching her in the head, knocking her glasses off, Jones said. Eventually, the two ended up on the floor, leaving Jones with bruises from her head down to her legs and nightmares for months to come.

"It was pretty traumatic," said Jones, who has taught for eight years in Boston Public Schools. "Not once did I feel unsafe until this year."

Educators have for generations been entrusted to keep their students safe, but over the last four years Massachusetts educators, including some who have been injured by students, have repeatedly raised concerns about their own safety. Many of educators said they had experienced physical violence from a student, according to a recent survey.

TEACHERS, Page A10

56%

'Nobody should expect to go to work and be hurt. It's very disheartening.'

DONNA GRADY,
president of the Franklin Education Association

Trump pledges new round of tariffs

Computer chips once again a target as officials scramble to explain shifts in strategy

By Tony Romm, Ana Swanson, and Tripp Mickle
NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON — President Trump signaled Sunday he would pursue new tariffs on the powerful computer chips inside smartphones and other technologies, just two days after his administration excluded a variety of electronics from the steep import taxes recently applied on goods arriving from China.

The push came as Trump's top economic advisers scrambled to explain the shifting strategy, after having insisted for weeks that they would shield no company or industry from any of the fees they have levied in a bid to reset US trade relationships.

The reprieve for technology companies arrived in the form of a Customs and Border Protection rule issued late Friday that spared high-tech imports from Trump's so-called reciprocal tariffs, including those on China. While the president paused a set of punishing levies on nearly 60 countries last week, his administration has forged ahead with a new 145 percent tax on Chinese exports, announcing it after Beijing retaliated against the United States.

TARIFFS, Page A6

Make America Go Away?

Those in Canadian tourism say welcome mat still out, but relations have changed

By Christopher Muther
GLOBE STAFF

OTTAWA — Canadians are booing the US national anthem at hockey and baseball games. They're canceling vacations to the United States en masse. In grocery stores, Canadian-made products are proudly marked with red maple leaves, while shoppers are flipping US-made products upside down on shelves to signal other shoppers to avoid them.

Since Donald Trump took office in January and began threatening Canada with a 25 percent tariff and repeatedly remarking that the country was "meant to be the 51st state," Canadian public opinion of the United States has dropped precipitously. A survey from the Association for Canadian Studies found that just one-third of Canadians have a favorable view of the United States, a 50 percent drop since last summer.

Meanwhile, Trump's actions have whipped up a frenzy of Canadian patriotism.

In shops, you can find "Canada Is Not for Sale" T-shirts and hats. MAGA-subversive "Make

TOURISTS, Page A7

JESSICA RINALDI/GLOBE STAFF

"It's exhausting, it's stressful," Melinda Delarosa said of the process to secure benefits for her and her son, Edison, in Waltham. "It's like a job in itself."

SEEKING HELP, FINDING KNOTS OF RED TAPE

State's bid to simplify process for housing, food aid languishes

By Esmey Jimenez
GLOBE STAFF

Melinda Delarosa is drowning in paperwork.

There are the documents for Section 8 for her family's subsidized housing in Waltham. More documents for SNAP, a federal food assistance program that gives her $297 a month and that requires a 17-page application, pay stubs, a lease agreement, bank statements, and a phone interview. Then there's the paperwork for

MONEY, POWER, INEQUALITY

Examining the racial wealth gap

MassHealth, which keeps her and her 10-year-old son, Edison, insured. Edison has autism and is currently not in school, so Delarosa is his full-time caretaker. But she said meeting deadlines and filling out paperwork roughly every four months for several programs puts a strain on her already busy schedule.

"It's exhausting, it's stressful," Delarosa said. "It's like a job in itself."

Millions of low-income people in Massachusetts — often women and families of color — have to navigate a labyrinth of red tape to eat, access health care, and stay housed. Making a mistake or missing a deadline means a delay in services or losing vital access altogether.

State efforts to consolidate state and federal programs into a common application have not materialized, despite a 2022 law meant to ease the administrative burden for those in need. Many are left to navigate the bureau-

BURDENS, Page A7

N.Y. plane crash kills MIT soccer standout, family

By Jake Offenhartz
ASSOCIATED PRESS

A private plane that crashed in upstate New York over the weekend, killing six people, was carrying a close-knit family of physicians and distinguished recent student-athletes including two MIT graduates, bound for a trip to the Catskills for a birthday celebration and the Passover holiday.

The twin-engine Mitsubishi MU-2B went down around noon Saturday in a muddy field in Copake, near the Massachusetts line, killing everyone on board, according to authorities and a family member who spoke to the Associated Press.

Among the victims were Karenna Groff, a former MIT soccer player named the 2022 NCAA woman of the year; her father, a neuroscientist, Dr. Michael Groff; her mother, Dr. Joy Saini, a urogynecologist; her brother, Jared Groff, a 2022 graduate of

CRASH, Page A10

Karenna Groff, native of Weston

Mastering a grand slam

In an Augusta thriller, Rory McIlroy became the sixth player to claim the career Grand Slam in golf. C1.

An early morning arson fire badly damaged the Pennsylvania governor's mansion and forced Governor Josh Shapiro, his family, and guests to flee. A2.

A corruption case centered on State Police troopers' testing of drivers for licenses is about to unfold in federal court. B1.

New Sox ace Garrett Crochet took a no-hitter into the 8th inning against his former team, the White Sox, eventually providing Boston a much-needed victory. C1.

Half ray there

Monday: Pleasant, warmer. High 61-66, low 44-49.

Tuesday: Showers early. High 60-65, low 39-44.

Sunrise: 6:05. Sunset: 7:25.

Weather and comics, D4-5.

Obituaries, C9.

For breaking news, updated stories, and more, visit our website:

BostonGlobe.com

VOL. 307, NO. 104

*

Suggested retail price $4.00

0 947725 4