THE 'dangerous' loner who tried to kidnap Princess Anne is back on the streets – unrepentant and still obsessed.

Ian Ball stalked the princess one evening in March 1974 before

Loner who tried to grab Princess and shot four men in 1974 is back on streets – and still fixated ambushing her car and shooting four men who came to her aid.

At the Old Bailey he was detained 'without limit of time' under the Mental Health Act after admitting attempted kidnap and two attempted murders.

But the Daily Mail can reveal he is out of Broadmoor secure mental hospital and is campaigning to clear his name.

He has been released on probation and can roam freely – despite remaining fixated on that night in The Mall.

After being released quietly in 2019, Ball self-published a disturbing book about the events of 1974 and visits old haunts in a bid to prove his innocence, despite having pleaded guilty in court.

In an extraordinary interview with the Daily Mail, Ball, now 77, said: 'I'm an innocent, sane man because I had
