

JUSTICES SAY BIAS LAWS ARE A SHIELD FOR ALL

Supreme Court rejects tougher standards for ‘majority group’ in workplace claims.

By David G. Savage and Suhauna Hussain

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the nation’s antidiscrimination laws apply equally to all employees, regardless of whether those complaining of bias are white or Black, gay or straight.

In a short and unanimous opinion, the justices rejected as outdated and mistaken the view that “members of a majority group” must show more evidence of discrimination before they can sue and win.

Instead, the justices said the Civil Rights Act of 1964 has always prohibited workplace discrimination against “any individual” who suffers discrimination because of race, color, religion, national origin and sex, including sexual orientation.

The law “draws no distinctions between majority-group plaintiffs and minority-group plaintiffs,” Justice Ketanji Brown Jackson said.

The ruling revives a discrimination lawsuit brought by Marlean Ames, an Ohio woman who said she was demoted and discriminated against by a lesbian who became her supervisor. She was then replaced by a gay man who had

UCLA chancellor vows to restore trust

Julio Frenk, newly inaugurated, addresses Trump’s research cuts, DEI and more.

By Jaweed Kaleem

Since he took the helm this year at UCLA, Chancellor Julio Frenk has found himself in a vortex of unprecedented obstacles affecting not only his campus, but also the nation’s institutions of higher education.

“Higher education in the United States faces its moment of greatest challenge in living memory,” Frenk said Thursday to more than 1,300 guests at Royce Hall as he was inaugurated UCLA’s seventh chancellor during a ceremony replete with professors in academic robes and regalia. “We must meet the moment with courage, resilience and wisdom.”

Days after he started Jan. 1, the worst fires in Los Angeles County history erupted. A mandatory Palisades fire evacuation zone expanded to the edge of the sprawling Westwood campus. Frenk’s first major decision: He pushed for classes to go online for two weeks, allowing

Paramount’s cost of compliance

Settling Trump’s lawsuit may be key to the media company’s $8-billion sale, but it faces mounting political heat and concerns

By Meg James

Paramount Global’s efforts to appease President Trump could carry a steep price, and not just financially. As Paramount executives struggle to win government approval for its planned sale, the legal risks and political headaches are spreading — from Washington to Sacramento.

Three U.S. senators have warned Paramount’s controlling shareholder Shari Redstone and other decision-makers that paying Trump to drop his $20-billion lawsuit over an October “60 Minutes” interview with former Vice President Kamala Harris could be considered a bribe.

Scrutiny widened late last week when two California Democrats proposed a state Senate hearing to probe details of the drama that has roiled the media company for months. The senators invited two former CBS News executives — who both left, in large part, because of the controversy — to testify before a joint committee hearing in Sacramento to help lawmakers examine problems with a possible Trump settlement.

“I haven’t seen a president act in this brazen of a manner,” state Sen. Josh Becker (D-Menlo Park) said in an interview. “We’re concerned about a possible chilling effect any settlement might have on investigative and political journalism. It would also send a message that politically motivated lawsuits can succeed, especially when paired with regulatory threats.”

Settling the Trump lawsuit is widely seen as a prerequisite for regulators to finally clear Paramount’s $8-

Trump, Musk launch into war of words

‘Have a nice day, DJT!’ taunts the Tesla CEO on X after the two exchange insults.

By Michael Wilner

WASHINGTON — President Trump’s friendship and political alliance with Elon Musk — the world’s richest man, who fueled Trump’s campaign with record amounts of cash before working at the White House by his side until last week — appears to be over, with both men leveling searing criticism against each other in a public row.

Musk had been criticizing the Trump administration over its signature legislation, the “One Big Beautiful Bill Act,” for its projected impact on the national debt throughout last week. But his calls to “kill the bill” on Wednesday prompted Trump, speaking to media from the Oval Office, to respond in kind.

“Elon and I had a great relationship; I don’t know if we will anymore,” Trump said Thursday. “And he hasn’t said bad things about me personally, but I’m sure that’ll be next. But I’m very disappointed in Elon.”

Musk, responding on his social media platform, X, took credit for Trump’s elec-

ICE to deport SoCal child

An outcry erupts in Torrance after the 9-year-old was seized with his dad last week.

By Nathan Solis and Ruben Vives

Earlier this week, residents in Torrance were scrambling to find out what happened to 9-year-old Martir Garcia Lara, a fourth-grader at Torrance Elementary School.

One day, he simply didn’t show up for school.

Teachers and PTA officials believed he was being held at a federal immigration facility with his father, but they could not get firm answers.

Federal authorities confirmed Thursday that the boy and his father were taken into custody May 29 after checking in with federal officials in downtown Los Angeles. The two were transferred to an immigration facility in Texas the following day, and officials plan to deport them to Honduras.

Parents with Torrance Elementary’s PTA sent out a letter asking residents to reach out to elected officials to drum up support for the boy. The PTA had few answers but was committed to making sure the public was aware that he was missing
