Kraft Heinz Plans Breakup

Company looks to spin off a large chunk of grocery business into a new entity

By Lauren Thomas and Jesse Newman

Kraft Heinz is preparing to break itself up, a decade after an infamous merger of two of the biggest names in packaged foods that was orchestrated by Warren Buffett and Brazilian private-equity firm 3G Capital Partners.

The company is planning to spin off a large chunk of its grocery business, including many Kraft products, into a new entity that could be valued at as much as $20 billion on its own, according to people familiar with the matter.

That would leave a company housing goods such as sauces and spreads like Heinz's namesake ketchup and Dijon mustard brand Grey Poupon.

The company has given priority to its faster-growing offerings like hot sauces, dressings and condiments, which are more in line with consumer preferences than processed lunch meats and cheeses.

It hopes the two separate units would be in total worth more than Kraft Heinz's roughly $31 billion market value.

A split could be finalized in the coming weeks, the people said. However, Kraft Heinz has discussed other scenarios with its advisers and its board hasn't signed off on a final decision, they cautioned.

The company is also still working through exactly which brands would be part of the spun-out entity, the people said.

"As announced in May,

Kraft Heinz has been evaluating potential strategic transactions to unlock shareholder value," a Kraft Heinz spokesperson said.

Any sizable breakup would mark a dramatic twist in what has been a tumultuous ride for Kraft Heinz since its 2015 deal, which was supposed to herald a new savior for U.S. packaged foods and show the unmatched appetite of 3G and Buffett.

It instead turned into a historically bad deal, with products that were once a mainstay of American pantries

Powell Pressured Over Fed HQ Cost Overruns

Trump allies' attack over renovation paves potential legal path to oust chair

By Nick Timiraos

White House advisers are ramping up a pressure campaign against Federal Reserve Chair Jerome Powell by alleging he either lied to Congress about the Fed's headquarters renovation or grossly mismanaged it, potentially creating a new legal avenue to oust him.

The complaints open a new line of attack against Powell as part of a broader push for him to lower interest rates. It follows President Trump's demands that the Fed consider federal debt-service costs when setting rates, something the institution has strongly resisted after securing its independence from the Treasury Department in 1951.

Trump said Friday he wasn't planning to remove Powell, whom he named as Fed chair during his first term, but said he was doing "a terrible job," and added "he's costing our country a lot of money."

The administration formalized its latest challenge Thursday with a letter from Russell Vought, Trump's budget director. In it, he implied Powell either made false statements to Congress about the $2.5 billion renovation of three office buildings overlooking the National Mall in

SpaceX Is Bright Spot For Musk's Empire

By Micah Maidenberger and Becky Peterson

Collapsing electric-vehicle sales, political fallout and an AI chatbot publishing antisemitic posts—much of Elon Musk's business empire is in disarray.

But the executive's rocket and satellite company remains as dominant as ever, riding high on the strength of technologies that rivals haven't mastered and close ties with U.S. government officials.

Privately held SpaceX has been working on a sale of employee shares that would value it at $400 billion, up 14% from six months ago, people familiar with the situation say. Bloomberg reported earlier on the new valuation.

Musk, who controls SpaceX with a more than 40% stake, recently projected close to $16 billion in revenue at the company this year. That would be up more than three times compared with 2022. Its Starlink satellite business has stoked those gains with a rapid global expansion.

Meanwhile, SpaceX is sitting on more than $3 billion of cash, which has helped the company to expand without raising new capital, people familiar with the matter said.

SpaceX has carved out powerful positions on several fronts. Its launch division frequently handles high-stakes

In Rural America, Killings By Police Are Rapidly Rising

A 17-year-old shot and killed by a sheriff's deputy on a New Mexico highway is one in a growing number of cases

By Zusha Elinson

Gina Via thought she saw an elk as she drove through the high desert of southern New Mexico one night last summer. As she drew closer, she realized it was a person walking dangerously close to the road. She decided to call 911.

Jacob Diaz-Austin, one of a few sheriff's deputies patrolling Otero County's 6,627 square miles, took the dispatcher's call for a welfare check on a possibly intoxicated pedestrian. He switched on his lights, cranked up the volume to the club hit "In da Getto," and sped to the scene, topping 120 miles an hour, according to audio and video recordings obtained by The Wall Street Journal.

The deputy slowed, stopped, and focused his spotlight on Elijah Hadley, a 17-year-old walking along the median near his home on the Mescalero Apache reservation. Fearful after getting beaten up the day before, Hadley carried a BB gun.

Within minutes, Diaz-Austin fired approximately 22 shots at Hadley. He shot four times just after Hadley dropped the BB gun.

A few minutes later, Diaz-Austin shot Hadley about 18 more times as he lay on the ground. Diaz-Austin now faces a first-degree

Dating show draws more viewers—and more singles vying for a spot in cast

By Helena Getahun-Hawkins

For much of this year, Cassidy Crosser made sure to answer all her spam phone calls.

"Hello? Love Island?" she would ask, hoping to hear that after applying three times, she had finally been cast on the hit reality dating TV show "Love Island USA."

"Obviously I didn't hear back. Because I'm not in Fiji," said Crosser, a 27-year-old daycare worker and wedding DJ from Burt, Iowa.

Paradise lost, or disaster averted?

"Love Island USA," a spinoff of the long-running British franchise, has reached peak pop-culture frenzy six years into its run. Fans gather in bars and living rooms for rowdy watch parties and break down the drama on

'Who Wants to Split A Plane With Me?'

By Andrew Zucker

Nick Molina was in the American Express Centurion Lounge at New York's LaGuardia Airport, chatting with a stranger about flight delays, when his fellow traveler asked if he'd considered flying private.

"She was telling me about this WhatsApp group," said Molina, a 57-year-old investor and former startup entrepreneur in Key Biscayne, Fla. "She offered to get me added."

Which is how he ended up in "S. Florida<->NY/Northeast," one of several active group chats where travelers, from the merely wealthy to actual billionaires, buy and sell seats on private flights. These invite-only chats focus on gilded routes—New York to Palm Beach, Aspen to Southern California, Texas to Cabo—and include thousands of members, at a time when delays and safety concerns have plagued commercial aviation.

"They'll go in a chat and say, 'Hey, I'm going to Aspen on August 1. Who wants to split a plane with me?'" said Peter Minikes, who runs private-jet charter company Priority One Jets.
