Concern over loss of Haitian workers

Business leaders warn of blow to Mass. economy

By Katie Johnston

In the wake of nearly 45,000 Haitians in Massachusetts losing their Temporary Protected Status Monday, many of whom fill crucial jobs in the economy, local business leaders warned their removal could have “lasting economic damage” on the state.

In already short-staffed sectors that provide care for older and disabled residents, overtime and temporary workers costs stand to rise significantly, employers said. Job vacancies will increase. And patients who have taken comfort from the same people assisting them year after year will face disruptions in their care.

More than a third of home health and personal care aides in the state are foreign-born, including many Haitian TPS holders.

“Our sector does not function without immigrants,” said Bill Yelenak, president of the Provident-HAITIANS, Page A10

An Asian verve revitalizes shopping

From food to fun, new outlets shine

For the past five years, one of Downtown Crossing’s biggest storefronts sat vacant after Forever 21 shut down. This spring, it found a new tenant. But it wasn’t another traditional clothing or department store. Instead, Teso Life, a two-story Asian lifestyle retailer that sells everything from Korean beauty products to snacks, moved in.

A few doors down, Japanese clothing giant Uniqlo opened in a space that had been empty for two decades, drawing crowds and a taiko drum performance on opening day. On Newbury Street, shoppers can explore Muji’s minimalist Japanese housewares, stop for a matcha latte at the pop-up-turned-café byChae, browse toys at MoreFun, and then duck into Memory Shop for a Korean-style photo booth ex-SHOPPING, Page A7

THE PROSECUTION

“This is a woman who acted intentionally, rationally, and swiftly to accomplish a very specific goal: to kill.”

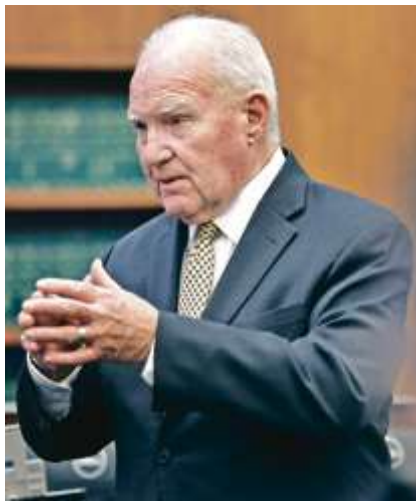

SHANAN BUCKINGHAM,
assistant district attorney

THE DEFENSE

“This is a woman who was suffering from psychosis at the time she went down to that basement.”

PLYMOUTH — Patrick Clancy took the stand Monday at the murder trial of his former wife, Lindsay, facing her for the first time since she killed their three children in 2023, as he described how their family life unraveled.

Clancy said his then-wife was suffering from postpartum depression and anxiety and confided in December 2022 that she was having “intrusive thoughts” about harming the children or of something bad happening to them.

But, he said, she sought help from numerous doctors, received in-patient psychiatric care, and “seemed happy” and “was having one of her best days” when she sent him to pick up takeout for dinner on Jan. 24, 2023. He said he had no inkling anything was wrong.

He recounted kissing 5-year-old Cora on the top of her head, rocking 8-month-old Callan on his knees, and smiling at 3-year-old Dawson, who was sitting on the couch eating chicken nuggets, and saying, “I’ll be right back.”

He found all three dead in the basement of his Duxbury home when he returned from picking up their food, strangled to death by Lindsay.

He took deep breaths to collect himself and, for a moment, raised red eyes to the ceiling when asked to describe his children.

Cora loved princesses and had a lot of friends, he said. Dawson was into trucks and watching the kids show “Paw Patrol.” Callan was a happy, thriving baby.

How roosters are ruffling feathers in Ogunquit

The metal roosters are high. So, too, is the drama over them.

Town’s fine over lawn decor sparks criticism and viral autism campaign

OGUNKIT, Maine — It sounds like the set-up for a mockumentary about a dogged small-town code enforcement officer. But the drama in Ogunquit over a flock of gigantic metal roosters is real — complete with circling national media, rumors of “snitching,” and a growing army of lawn roosters mustering in solidarity as far away as New Zealand.

The story of a zoning dispute over roosters — and how it turned the birds into an emblem of support for autism awareness — kicked into high gear in early April.

That’s when a certified “Notice of Violation” from the Town of Ogunquit landed at the Omelette Factory, a beloved breakfast and lunch spot on busy Route 1.

“Dear Business Owner,” it read. “Despite our recent communications regarding the unpermitted signage on
