

Allies gird for risks as economic order shifts

Trump’s ‘America First’ approach replaces U.S.-led globalization

BY DAVID J. LYNCH

The open split that emerged last week between the United States and some of its closest allies highlights the seismic changes that are in store for the global economy amid the transition from full-blown U.S.-led globalization to an unruly new order.

For decades, U.S. policymakers promoted global economic integration as a way of delivering peace and prosperity. Now foreign leaders and investors are reassessing those ties, putting more emphasis on avoiding geopolitical dangers, especially those emanating from a less predictable United States.

Commercial links between nations made the global economy more efficient. But they created vulnerabilities that the U.S. and other governments weaponized using tariffs, financial sanctions and supply chain restrictions. President Donald Trump’s recent threat to impose tariffs on European allies that opposed his plan to gain ownership of Greenland exploited Europe’s dependence on Washington.

The clash put at risk transatlantic trade worth nearly $1 trillion as well as a new U.S. trade deal with the European Union, which included $600 billion in promised European investment in the United States. Though the immediate crisis has passed, allied leaders vowed they will not leave themselves open to such threats again.

Protesters in Iran killed as they fled fire, witnesses say

Iranian security forces gunned down dozens of protesters trying to escape a devastating blaze in the Caspian Sea city of Rasht during a nationwide uprising earlier this month, according to four witness accounts provided to The Washington Post.

The bloodshed came after days of mounting public protest in the city against the Iranian government, including the mass closure of shops by merchants in Rasht’s historic bazaar.

After the open-air market caught fire, protesters who had sought refuge from security forces within its labyrinthine alleys began to flee and were confronted by uniformed riot police and plainclothes officers, on motorcycles and on foot, armed with shotguns and assault rifles, according to one protester’s account. Security forces were firing directly at the people, another Rasht resident said.

“Security forces were shooting with Kalashnikovs into the bazaar,” Saman, a witness who participated in the protests, said in an interview. “It was terrifying. They killed so many people, even people escaping.”

The forces also blocked fire trucks from immediately responding to the fire, two witnesses

Shootings underline how Noem has transformed DHS

BY MARIANNE LEVINE AND BRIANNA SACKS

BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS — Homeland Security Secretary Kristi L. Noem arrived at a ranch along the U.S.-Mexico border on the morning of Jan. 7 to host a roundtable on the historic decline in illegal border crossings. It was supposed to be a friendly event. Noem would ride a horse near the Rio Grande, get a look at buoys being installed in the water to deter migrants from entering the United States and hear from admiring ranchers.

But a minute before the event began, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement officer shot and killed Renée Good on a street in Minneapolis, inflaming tensions over the Trump administration’s mass deportation campaign. The shooting was still registering across the nation when Noem

People on Sunday gather at a makeshift memorial at the site in Minneapolis where Alex Pretti, a 37-year-old ICU nurse, pictured above, was fatally shot by a federal immigration agent the day before. The Justice Department and the FBI have so far been absent in investigating the incident. The Department of Homeland Security has instead taken the lead.

Nation’s gun debate reshuffles from past ideological lines

BY NAFTALI BENDAVID AND KIM BELLWARE

The killing of Alex Pretti in Minneapolis has scrambled America’s gun debate, another reflection of the bitterness and polarization that have engulfed the dispute over the national crackdown on immigration by federal agents.

Pretti, a 37-year-old ICU nurse, was carrying a gun in or near his waistband when he was killed on Saturday, but videos show he had not withdrawn it and was disarmed before being shot multiple times. Local authorities believe he had a permit to carry the gun.

With Americans split between those supporting the Trump administration and those backing anti-ICE protesters, multiple conservatives — including those strongly supportive of gun rights in the past — have justified Pretti’s

MINNESOTA VOWS TO INVESTIGATE

Federal agents have denied state access

BY PERRY STEIN, JEREMY ROEBUCK AND MOLLY HENNESSY-FISKE

Since U.S. Border Patrol fatally shot a protester in Minneapolis on Saturday morning, the federal agencies that would typically be involved in investigating an officer-involved shooting have been on the sidelines.

Federal law enforcement leaders in Minnesota haven’t made public statements or appearances. FBI agents and prosecutors in the state are confused about what — if anything — their involvement will be in the investigation, according to multiple people familiar with the U.S. attorney’s office in Minnesota, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of fear of retaliation.

In the apparent absence so far of the Justice Department, Minnesota authorities have vowed to pursue an investigation under state laws into the shooting of Alex Pretti, a 37-year-old ICU nurse. That has set up a potential legal clash between state and federal authorities. Already, the state has sued the federal government, successfully asking a judge over the weekend to ensure that federal law enforcement officials do not destroy evidence.

The Justice Department’s apparent back seat in the investigation contrasts with how the agency has frequently handled similar officer-involved fatal shootings. Typically, federal investigators would take the lead, deploying FBI agents and Civil Rights Division prosecutors — the department’s experts in investigating use-of-force cases.

That has not occurred in this case, according to two people familiar with the matter, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss internal decisions that have not been made public.

“This is extremely out of the norm,” said Bryna Godar, a staff attorney for the State Democracy Research Initiative at the University of Wisconsin Law School. “Typically, whether or not a shooting is ultimately found to be

Deadly monster storm rampages across the U.S.

More than a million lose power as officials say the worst is yet to come

BY BRADY DENNIS, BEN NOLL, TIM CRAIG AND KATIE SHEPHERD

A colossal winter storm barreled across an unusually large swath of the nation on Sunday, dumping snow and ice from Oklahoma to the Deep South to New England. The giant system knocked out power to more than a million customers, caused deaths in multiple states, prompted widespread school cancellations, ground travel to a halt and promised more uncertainty during the frigid days to come.

This situation is expected to get worse before it gets better,” warned Mississippi Gov. Tate Reeves (R), who implored residents to stay off perilous roads and detailed how some utilities had suffered “catastrophic damage” that could lead to prolonged
