Planned layoffs endanger special ed services

Education Dept. unit distributes $300m to help Mass. students with disabilities

Announced layoffs threatening to decimate a weakened US Education Department are stoking fears among special education advocates, families, and school leaders over the potential fallout for more than 190,000 students with disabilities in Massachusetts.

The federal cuts, which were announced Oct. 10 amid a government shutdown, would largely eliminate Education Department staff who ensure students receive support from their schools through the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA), the 50-year-old landmark law that guarantees that students with disabilities have a right to a free and appropriate public education.

A federal judge in California Wednesday imposed a pause of the layoffs. If the Trump administration gets its way, local advocates and administrators say that the layoffs wouldn't be expected to have an immediate effect on services for students. But they worry about the long-term implications of further dismantling the Education Department, which has long been a goal of President Trump.

"There's no good news here," said Edith Bazile, chairperson of Boston Public Schools' Special Education Parent Advisory Council. "Students with disabilities can't afford for the federal government to walk away,"

Israel hits Gaza, says Hamas broke deal

Spate of violence imperils truce, but both sides vow to maintain peace process

By Isabel Kershner
NEW YORK TIMES

JERUSALEM — Israel on Sunday launched its heaviest wave of attacks on the Gaza Strip since a fragile cease-fire took hold a week ago and said it had temporarily suspended humanitarian aid after accusing Hamas of violating the truce by firing on its soldiers, killing two.

After nightfall, the Israeli military said in a statement that it had "begun the renewed enforcement of the cease-fire" after carrying out a series of significant strikes against Hamas targets and in accordance with a directive from the government.

The deadly flare-up of violence Sunday and the temporary suspension of aid were the most serious tests yet of the cease-fire, which was negotiated under heavy pressure by the Trump administration and signed with great fanfare by President Trump.

The aid was halted because of the intensity of the Israeli strikes and was expected to resume once the bombing was over, according to an Israeli official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss a sensitive matter. Israeli officials had initially said that humanitarian aid would be suspended until further notice but later appeared to step back from that decision.

The Boston Public Market opened a decade ago, showcasing products exclusively from New England.

A marketplace of differing ideas

10 years in, Boston Public Market struggles with both profits and mission

A decade ago, Boston Public Market opened its doors with the promise of local abundance.

It was Boston's answer to Philadelphia's Reading Terminal Market or the famed Pike Place Market in Seattle, situated in the heart of downtown and showcasing products exclusively "grown, raised, caught or produced in New England."

This was great news if you love a fresh-caught scallop. But if you wanted a lemon to squeeze on it, you were out of luck. (Lemons being famously not from New England.)

Over time, the market came to allow lemons. Other concessions followed. It gradually allowed more non-food vendors, positioning itself as a business incubator for jewelry-makers, artists, even a cactus shop.

Wander the halls today, and there are still crowds at lunch hour. But fewer farms sell food. There's only one produce stall, no cheese-monger, and no meat vendor. If you want to bring home a complete meal, you'll need to make another stop.

A decade in, the BPM sits at the intersection of several economic challenges: Vulnerable local food systems. Downtown's fragile recovery. Constantly shifting consumer demands.

And despite the original vision, the market has never quite settled on what it is. Nor has it ever broken even.

Seniors caught in middle of insurance shift

Cost rises, coverage falls for Medicare Advantage

Tens of thousands of senior Massachusetts residents may find that Medicare Advantage plans are charging higher premiums, shrinking provider networks, covering fewer drugs, and offering fewer perks as Medicare's open enrollment period gets underway.

The popular plans managed by private insurers are coming under pressure as soaring drug and medical costs, growing enrollments, and changes to federal payment systems turn Medicare Advantage from profit centers to loss generators.

All told, nearly 70,000 people across the state's three largest Medicare Advantage providers — about one in six people enrolled in the plans in Massachusetts — will see their coverage disrupted at some level.

Edward Dailey, 81, said he has long viewed the Medicare Advantage plan he gets through Blue Cross Blue Shield as a bargain. But now, he said, the premium is jumping nearly 25 percent to $108 per month from $87 (on top of the 2025 premium

Along northern border, a sheriff pushes back on Vt.'s 'sanctuary' policies

By Paul Heintz

CANAAN, Vt. — As he drove north along the Connecticut River, Sheriff Trevor Colby nodded toward rambling farmhouses and worn trailers, ticking off the incidents he'd encountered at each one.

"We're now coming into a territory where we've got a homicide, where we've got a burglary, grand larceny, drug case, stolen guns," he said, steering his white department-issued pickup around a river bend on a rainy autumn day. "Burglary, stolen copper."

Colby, 55, has seen plenty in 14 years policing Essex County, the most rural stretch of Vermont's Northeast Kingdom, bordering New Hampshire and Canada. Long before that, at age 15, he got a taste of law enforcement when his father, Amos, was elected county sheriff, and Colby found himself answering emergency calls at the kitchen table.
