Like other detainees, student sent far away

Use of isolated locales now common

By Samantha J. Gross

Last week, Tufts University graduate student Rümeysa Öztürk was arrested in Massachusetts and, before a judge could intervene, shipped off to the South Louisiana ICE processing center in the rural marshlands of southern Louisiana about 1,660 miles from her apartment in Somerville.

Her case has drawn international attention as the Trump administration attempts to deport Öztürk and others under a relatively obscure provision of federal immigration law that allows for the deportation of non-citizens whose presence or activities are deemed to have “potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States.” Öztürk has not been charged with any crime.

Sending detainees to remote, often privately run immigration detention centers in Texas, Louisiana, and Mississippi has emerged as a common practice amid President Trump’s second-term promise to carry out mass deportations.

And while the federal government wrote that she was sent to Louisiana because “there was no available bed-

Trump takes a chance with sweeping tariffs

Says he will ‘pry open foreign markets’; prices likely to rise at least in short term

By Jim Puzzanghera

WASHINGTON — President Trump’s second term has been all about using executive authority to impose his will on immigrants, universities, and government agencies. But imposing his will on US consumers and manufacturers presents a much different — and more politically perilous — challenge.

In announcing sweeping new tariffs Wednesday, Trump is trying to reshape the US economy to encourage more domestic production.

“With today’s action, we are finally going to be able to make America great again, greater than ever before,” Trump said in a White House ceremony on what he dubbed “Liberation Day.” “We will supercharge our domestic industrial base. We will pry open foreign markets and break down foreign trade barriers. And, ultimately, more production at home will mean stronger competition and lower prices for consumers.”

Starting Thursday, the United States will levy significantly higher tariffs on imports, he declared, a minimum of 10 percent and in some cases higher based on what other countries charge on US products. Goods from the European Union will face a 20 percent tariff and Chinese goods will be hit with a 34 percent tariff. All foreign-made automobiles will be subject to a 25 percent tariff, he said.

Those tariffs and ones al-

Susie Sheehan — shown with her son, Jacob — and her husband have an extra embryo following IVF treatments.

After successful birth, an unexpected question

By Beth Teitell

Susie Sheehan sat alone on her couch, shaken by an invoice she’d received that day from her fertility clinic. As her husband and two children slept upstairs, she grabbed her phone, opened Facebook, and poured out her anguish.

“Starting to get charged storage for our one embryo,” she posted in a moms group. “So at the point where we need to decide what to do with it.

“My husband doesn’t want to have more than 2 kiddos . . . but I still can’t get the idea of 3 out of my head. . . . Has anyone else experienced this and how did you navigate it?”

Faced with storage fees and a charged atmosphere, women who used IVF wonder what to do with surplus embryos

Was it only three years ago when Sheehan and her husband started the IVF process? She’d gotten pregnant naturally with her first child but had turned to fertility treatments for her second. And back then, on a Zoom consultation from their Haverhill home with her doctor, the idea of having a surplus of embryos — of enjoying too much success — was not even something the couple could fully allow themselves to consider.

“I was just focused on having a baby,” said Sheehan, an interior designer.

But now there’s this extra embryo, thrusting the Sheehans into a position that’s common but surprisingly rarely discussed. Sean

Way cleared for revamp of White Stadium

Judge rules project legal; win for Wu, soccer team

A Superior Court judge Wednesday afternoon unequivocally rebuffed attempts by opponents to halt the renovation of White Stadium in Franklin Park.

In ruling the project does not violate state laws, Judge Matthew Nestor handed a major victory to Mayor Michelle Wu during an election year. Wu has proposed rebuilding the crumbling 76-year-old venue used by Boston school athletes in partnership with a new professional women’s soccer team that hopes to begin playing in the renovated stadium next March.

“In a City of sports champions, this is a historic victory,” said Wu in a statement. “Together, after so many years of broken promises, we will give our young people and all our residents the scale of investment and opportunity that Franklin Park and our City deserve.”

The public-private partnership has sparked both pushback and support for its ambition and cost ever since the city first announced the deal with Boston Unity Soccer Partners, the investment group behind the

Transit leader at the center of a storm

Tibbitts-Nutt criticized for saying too much, and too little

Shortly before Thanksgiving, Transportation Secretary Monica Tibbitts-Nutt sent an email to state and local officials announcing big changes to a long-debated proposal about how to transform the Boston neighborhood of Allston. A couple weeks later, a high-level meeting was held at the State House to discuss a path forward.

Missing from the room was the central player: Tibbitts-Nutt. Instead, on a TV screen off to the side, her name appeared on the background of a Zoom meeting, according to two people who were present. The transit chief did not say a word. She never turned her video on. People in the room wondered: Was she even listening?
