

DON LEACH Daily Pilot

WITH ITS scenic setting and proximity to nightlife, Laguna Beach is a popular stop for tourists. The city has had the highest number of DUI arrests per capita of any city of its size in California for two decades.

In Laguna Beach, stepping up awareness to stop DUIs

Bars, restaurants are notified when a patron they served is arrested

BY HANNAH FRY

The roughly seven-mile stretch of Coast Highway in Laguna Beach is known worldwide for its postcard-perfect views and gateway to the city's eclectic art and retail scene.

But it is also ground zero for drunk drivers.

Officials say Laguna Beach has had the highest number of DUI arrests per capita of any city of its size in California for at least two decades, in part because it is a magnet for many tourists and visitors who drive in for the day. While the city's population is only about 22,000, Laguna Beach sees about 6.5 million visitors annually.

The situation has prompted Laguna Beach to [See Laguna, A10]

Coastline Pilot

AN OFFICER in Laguna Beach checks a breathalyzer in 2015. A new initiative seeks to raise awareness among businesses in an effort to reduce DUI arrests.

A sobering look at probiotic firms' hangover claims

Scientists explain their skepticism over the benefits of the bacteria supplements.

BY CORINNE PURTILL

The ads on podcasts and social media were tantalizing: over-the-counter probiotic supplements that could ward off the worst effects of a hangover if taken before drinking.

As a bourbon reviewer who enjoys the flavor of spirits but has always been easily prone to hangovers, Eric Burke was intrigued. He ordered a few bottles of Pre-Alcohol, a probiotic drink from the company ZBiotics, to test it out.

He downed the mixture of water, salt, flavoring and genetically modified bacteria. He followed it with a cocktail, a meal and two bourbons, and woke up the next morning feeling considerably more chipper than he'd have expected.

The next night, emboldened by success, he drank another half-ounce bottle of Pre-Alcohol. He drank a bit more than the previous night — a beer with dinner and then four tumblers of bourbon.

That amount typically would leave him feeling achy and sluggish the day after.

Which was exactly how he felt when he opened his eyes hours later.

"That one was unpleasant," said Burke, 48. "I woke up that morning being just like, 'Well, I'm not 21 anymore.'"

A hangover is a collection of physical and mental symptoms resulting from the inflammation and oxidative stress that alcohol wreaks in the human body.

One of many factors contributing to day-after misery is the accumulation of acetaldehyde, a chemical by-product of the beverages' ethanol breaking down in the body. Acetaldehyde is a carcinogen that features prominently in the nausea, [See Hangover, A10]

An astute peacemaker unfazed by hard truths

A 2010 visit to Sudan was just one of many that Carter made to places with refugees, poverty, disease and despair to see and bear witness

BY JEFFREY FLEISHMAN

Jimmy Carter wore a button-down shirt in Khartoum. It was a sweltering morning and the sun shone on the Nile as the clamorous city was rousing to life. Carter was in the Sudanese capital to monitor the 2010 election that was certain to extend the rule of autocrat Omar Hassan Ahmed Bashir, who had been indicted on international charges of crimes against humanity.

Carter was not deterred. He believed the first multiparty election in decades — no matter how flawed — would bring the war-scarred country closer to democracy. His blue eyes agleam, his trousers pressed, the former president, a wanderer accustomed to the planet's cruel and harsh predicaments, offered coffee and pastries in his hotel room. He was optimistic but knew well what could happen when leaders with outsize ambitions controlled holy men and armies.

I was in town covering the story for The Times, and a representative from the Carter Center called and invited me to breakfast.

Carter, who died Sunday at 100, was president when I was a teenager. I knew him well from TV — that swoop of hair, Southern accent and disarming resolve that confronted a post-Watergate world of gas lines, inflation, the Iran hostage crisis and a sense that America was [See Khartoum, A5]

ABD RAOUF Associated Press

FORMER President Carter visits a polling station in Khartoum during Sudan's 2010 multiparty elections.

Verdict against Trump is upheld
A Manhattan jury last year awarded columnist E. Jean Carroll $5 million for defamation and sexual abuse. NATION, A5

Latino vote shows power in election
Support can no longer be taken for granted after defying patterns, Gustavo Arellano writes. CALIFORNIA, B1

Home insurance costs may rise
To fix a troubled market, the state will allow insurers to raise premiums to pay for reinsurance. BUSINESS, A6

Weather
Fog to sunshine.
L.A. Basin: 63/48. B6

7 85944 00200 5

Get the story as it's happening.

Download the app for instant breaking news alerts.

