

FARMWORKERS plant broccoli in Camarillo this week as the crucial summer harvest season gets underway. AL SEIB For The Times

Farms, hotels, restaurants push back on ICE raids

By Queenie Wong, Suhauna Hussain, Michael Wilner and Piper Heath

Farms, hotels and restaurants that rely on immigrant workers are urging the Trump administration to spare their vital industries from immigration raids. The pressure comes as confusion swirls around whether President Trump will exempt some businesses from efforts to arrest and deport immigrants living illegally in the United States. Last week, Trump posted on Truth Social that he would focus his immigration crackdown on criminals, not farmers. Those workers, along with people employed in hotel and leisure businesses, raised concerns that his administration's "aggressive policy on immigration" is taking away jobs that are "almost impossible to replace," the post said. Officials from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security confirmed to The Times on Saturday that immigration enforcement would primarily focus on people accused of violent crimes, a move that signaled the agency would back away from workplace raids at hotels, restaurants and farms. But, this week, further guidance from DHS leadership seemed to reverse that directive, causing

Crowded ICE facility unsafe, unsanitary, staff and visitors say

Number of detainees surges from estimated 300 to 1,200 at Inland Empire center in less than two months.

By Jenny Jarvie and Nathan Solis

ADELANTO, Calif. — As federal immigration agents conduct mass raids across Southern California, the Adelanto ICE Processing Center is filling so rapidly it is reigniting longtime concerns about safety conditions inside the facility. In less than two months, the number of detainees in the sprawling complex about 85 miles northeast of Los Angeles has surged from around 300 near the end of April to more than 1,200 as of Wednesday, according to the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California. The largest detention center in California, Adelanto has for years been the focus of complaints from detainees, attorneys and state and federal inspectors about inadequate medical care, overly restrictive segregation and lax mental health services. But now, critics — including some staff members there — warn that conditions inside have become increasingly unsafe and unsanitary. The facility, they say, is woefully unprepared to handle a massive increase in the number of detainees. "It's dangerous," a longtime Adelanto detention center staff member told The Times, speaking on condition of anonymity because they did not want to lose their job. "We have no staffing for this and not enough experienced staff. They're just cutting way too many corners, and it affects the safety of everybody in there." On Tuesday, U.S. Rep. Judy Chu (D-Monterey Park), toured Adelanto with four other Democratic members of Congress from California amid growing concern over the rapidly increasing number of detainees and deteriorating conditions inside the facility. The facility's manager "has to clearly improve its treatment of these detainees," Chu said at a news conference after inspecting the facility for nearly two hours. Some detainees told law-

Legislators denied entry at facilities

Several members of Congress are turned away at immigrant detention sites. PERSPECTIVES, A2

It's a 'death race' for food in Gaza

Hundreds have been killed trying to get scarce aid during chaotic deliveries under Israeli system.

By Bilal Shbeir and Nabih Bulos

DEIR AL BALAH, Gaza Strip — Like "Squid Game." That's how residents describe it, invoking the dystopian TV show when recounting the lethal gantlet that getting aid in famine-haunted Gaza has become. "It's a death race. The faster, the stronger, the luckier — they're the ones who might survive, might reach the food," said 30-year-old Mohammed al-Shaqra. "It feels like we're animals, racing for a box of supplies as if our lives depend on it. And they do." Ever since Israel sidelined the United Nations and other humanitarian aid organizations late last month and tasked assistance operations to the Gaza Humanitarian Foundation, an opaque U.S.- and Israeli-backed private contractor registered in Delaware, killing has been the near-daily companion of aid deliveries. On Thursday, health authorities in Gaza said 12 people were killed near one of

JERRY BUSS, right, with children Jeanie, left, Johnny, Jim and Janie in 1979, the year he bought the Lakers from Jack Kent Cooke for $67.5 million. GUNTHER MPTV Images

The Lakers' epic family saga

It's Showtime! Over a 45-year span, Jerry Buss and his kids made the team a Hollywood marvel.

By Dan Woike

The story is so good, so rich, that Hollywood couldn't resist. The Lakers, a golden brand. The stars on the basketball court. The celebrities on the sidelines. The spotlight on the show flying up and down the floor 24 seconds at a time. HBO made a series. Books have been authored. Documentaries have been filmed. No hyperbole is too outrageous. Magic Johnson and Larry Bird helped save basketball. The Lakers were the greatest show in town. The highs and lows, the devastation and the jubilation, made them iconic. And the ringmasters for the last 45 years have been the Buss family. That era culminated Wednesday when a majority of Buss' six children agreed to sell controlling interest of the franchise to Mark Walter for a record price — a $10-billion valuation that's the highest in pro sports history. The initial reaction to the news — a sale that shocked the Lakers' biggest partners inside and outside of the NBA —

PALESTINIANS have had to trek miles through combat zones to get aid from an Israeli-backed group. ABDEL KAREEM HANA Associated Press

Bag bans linked to less shore pollution

Plastics policies may help reduce waste that turns up in coastal cleanups, study finds.

By Niamh Ordner

Ever since their invention in 1959, plastic bags have become synonymous with shopping. For many people, it's difficult to imagine a quick grocery run without the crinkle of a plastic bag, and even harder to believe that using an alternative could make a meaningful difference in reducing plastic pollution — but a new national study suggests that, in many places, it already has. A 2021 global survey found that plastic bags accounted for 14% of 12 million marine litter items gathered during beach cleanups — making them by far the most common type of trash in the study. They're lightweight, rarely recycled, and easily caught and transported by winds, making them especially likely to end up in waterways, where they can persist for decades. This combination of durability and disposability has made plastic bags one of the most stubborn contributors to environmental pollution, particularly along coastlines. However, a growing body of evidence suggests that instituting regulations on plastic bag usage — where California has long been a national leader — has had a

Dodgers enter immigration fray

Team officials say five ICE agents were denied entry at stadium amid protests. SPORTS, B10

Western mayors cite lack of water

Group urges White House to address the depleting Colorado River. CLIMATE, A9

Pixar banks on original content

Animation studio hopes "Elio" can find success the way "Toy Story" and "Up" did. BUSINESS, A10

Weather Turning sunny. L.A. Basin: 79/62. B6

Opinion Voices A13 Obituaries B5

For the latest news, go to latimes.com.

Every story. Every section. Every feature. Subscribers get unlimited app access. Download now.

