

Pressley says she won't take on Markey

Will seek reelection to House seat instead of shooting for Senate

By Tal Kopan and Sam Brodey
GLOBE STAFF

Representative Ayanna Pressley of Boston said Tuesday that she will forgo challenging incumbent Senator Ed Markey in the Democratic primary next year and instead will run for reelection to her House seat.

A fourth-term lawmaker and former member of the Boston City Council, Pressley said she gave a Senate bid serious consideration as she received encouragement from supporters, but decided against it based on her commitment to her family and community.

"Ultimately in this moment, I feel called to fight for the MA 7th in Congress," Pressley told the Globe in an exclusive interview. "I'm not closing the door to a Senate run down the line, and I've never done the work of organizing or movement building just for an election cycle — that's the work that I do year-round and especially in these unprecedented times, so that work will continue."

Nationally known and well-liked among progressives, Pressley was seen as a strong contender for the Senate seat — a point that she emphasized in the interview, saying her campaign team's analysis showed a "a strong path

PRESSLEY, Page A5

Legal teams struggle to provide for immigrants

By Mara Kardas-Nelson
GLOBE STAFF

As an experienced paralegal, Gabriella De Oliveira is used to being hands-on with her clients as they prepare for immigration court. She acts as a translator, gathers documents, and helps clients prep for interviews.

But when she assisted Rosane Ferreira De Oliveira as part of the legal team representing her, it was clear this case, under President Trump's immigration enforcement playbook, would be different.

Ferreira De Oliveira, 40, had applied for asylum in August 2023, soon after she arrived in the United States. While awaiting her immigration hearing, she was allowed to live freely. She made her home in Worcester, working as a house cleaner and raising her daughters.

In May, she was detained by ICE. With their client in custody, Ferreira De Oliveira's legal team faced a lot more work. The paralegal had to call Ferreira De Oliveira's family and friends in Brazil to hunt down essential documents. (De Oliveira and Ferreira De Oliveira are not related.)

Normally, clients are responsible for that task. Having the paralegal take it on turned

LEGAL HELP, Page A7

Dells to give $6.25b directly to US children

Will seed 25 million investment accounts

By Nicholas Kulish
NEW YORK TIMES

Michael and Susan Dell announced Tuesday that they would deposit $250 in individual investment accounts for 25 million children, an amount totaling $6.25 billion. It is one of the largest philanthropic gifts ever to go directly to Americans.

The money expands the number of children who will receive seed money for the investment accounts, known as "Trump accounts." The federal government will give $1,000 to babies born between Jan. 1, 2025, and Dec. 31, 2028. The Dells' gift extends to children up to 10 years old, though it limits eligibility to those who live in a ZIP code where the median household income is below $150,000.

At a press event at the White House on Tuesday, President Trump, standing with the Dells, called the couple "two special people" and said the accounts were "real trust funds for every American child."

The federal government is expected to set up the accounts next summer, but many details of how they will work are still to be determined. There is no system in place yet for registering, and it is unclear where the accounts will reside.

Michael Dell, the chair and CEO of Dell Technologies, first made his fortune by selling personal computers directly to consumers rather than through retail outlets. He sees this gift in a similar light.

"When I started a company 41 years ago, we created the direct model," Dell said. "This is sort of the direct model philanthropy."

The Dells hope that other philanthropists, corporations, and state and local governments will follow their example, pumping billions more into the accounts. The approach could become a model for

DONATION, Page A6

'The kids who don't speak English are always more isolated and lonely.'

KAYRA AMADOR, a Dominican parent mentor

Words of welcome for English learners

As BPS grapples with shortage of bilingual teachers, parent mentors are easing the way

By Mariana Simões
GLOBE STAFF

After Cynthia Soto moved to the United States from the Dominican Republic, it took six years before she could afford to bring her kids to Boston last year.

When they arrived, her two youngest started school at Blackstone Elementary in the South End, where classes are mostly taught in English.

"They looked like they were in the clouds, they didn't understand anything," Soto, who works as a home attendant for the elderly, said.

Soto, who considered taking them to a psychologist at first, was relieved when a Spanish-speaking teacher's aide stepped in for language support and the kids started doing better.

PHOTOS BY SUZANNE KREITER/GLOBE STAFF

At top, Mariammy Romero spoke during a program at St. Stephen's Episcopal Church that helps train parent mentors. The program has worked with mothers who hail from Haiti, Mexico, Morocco, Somalia, and other countries.

Now Soto, 33, is doing the same for other children, by working as a parent mentor at her kids' school four days a week for $19 an hour.

The parent mentors are one of many strategies Boston Public Schools is using to address a serious shortage. One-third of the district's 47,000 students primarily speak a language other than English, but the schools don't have nearly enough bilingual teachers to offer them support in their native tongue.

Research shows English language learners do best when they receive at least some instruction in two languages.

In Boston, the district has on-

BILINGUAL, Page A6

Lexington voters ready to decide if time and price are right for new high school

Lexington High School opened in the mid-1950s and has repeatedly been expanded over the years.

By James Vaznis
GLOBE STAFF

LEXINGTON — For 16-year-old Luke Yung, navigating the multibuilding campus at Lexington High School often feels like he's attempting a 300-meter dash, as he weaves his way through gridlocked hallways among 2,400 students changing classes.

The frantic scene persists in the two cafeterias, where long lines eat up most of Yung's half-hour lunch and popular items often run out. And forget about finding an empty seat. He and his friends usually stand outside and eat, even in the rain. It's what life is like for him on a campus designed for 600 fewer students.

"There's no time to take a breath for yourself and pause," he said, noting the school desperately needs a new facility.

School district leaders are hoping to remedy the crowding and other problems on the aging campus with a new $660 million high school. It would be one of the most expensive public schools built in Massachusetts as school construction

LEXINGTON, Page A7

Around the time his wife went missing, Brian Walshe allegedly sought out an article titled "10 ways to dispose of a body if you really need to," a jury heard on the trial's second day. B1.

Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth cited the "fog of war" in defending a strike on a boat. A2.

Ex-Harvard president Larry Summers was banned from the American Economic Association after new revelations about his ties to Jeffrey Epstein. B5.

The shingles vaccine may help people who already have dementia, researchers say. A6.

Drake Maye's wife, Ann Michael, has baked her way into Patriots fans' hearts with her creations. Here's how the apple cinnamon oat crumble bars taste. G1.

Clearing it up

Wednesday: Pleasant. High 38-43. Low 30-35.

Thursday: Very cold late. High 39-44. Low 13-18.

High tide: 8:58 a.m., 9:37 p.m.

Sunrise: 6:56 Sunset: 4:12

Weather and Comics, G6-7.

VOL. 308, NO. 156

Suggested retail price
$4.00

