STOCK markets took a £2trillion hit yesterday after Donald Trump pushed the world to the brink of a full-scale trade war.

Panic spread among investors in London, Europe, Asia and Wall Street after the US President slapped huge tariffs on America's trading partners, stoking widespread fears of a recession.

In the biggest shake-up of the global trade order in decades, Mr Trump raised import taxes to the world's largest economy to the highest level in a century – sending the markets into meltdown.

The rout was a devastating blow to millions of British savers who have money tied up in shares through their pensions, Isas and other investments.

Keir Starmer took the first step towards retaliating yesterday as he warned there would 'clearly be an economic impact from the
