Beth Israel Lahey Health names next CEO

Was architect of merger; wooed Dana-Farber

Beth Israel Lahey Health on Thursday named as its new head the internal executive who helped persuade Dana-Farber Cancer Institute to break up with Mass General Brigham and form a partnership with his health care system.

Peter Shorett, 46, the No. 2 executive at Beth Israel Lahey, will start as CEO in January. He will succeed Dr. Kevin Tabb, who has led the organization and its predecessor, Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center, for 15 years.

Tabb is the longest-serving chief executive of a health care system in the state. He announced plans in March to step aside in 2027, saying the time had come for fresh energy.

The promotion of Shorett, Beth Israel Lahey’s senior executive vice president and chief operating officer, elevates someone who has played a central role there for the better part of a decade. Indeed, he helped to create the health system, the state’s second-largest behind Mass General Brigham.

Shorett was an architect of the 2019 mega-merger of Beth Israel, Lahey Health, and a bevy of community hospitals that established Beth Israel Lahey. At the time, he was a senior partner of Chartis, a Chicago-based health care consulting firm where he worked for READING — Hours after a mother of three was found shot to death in the family’s home Thursday morning, her adult son was captured in Vermont, ending a search that left this suburban community grieving and on edge.

Ryan Hanafin, 22, was located and taken into custody by Vermont State Police, according to Middlesex District Attorney Marian Ryan and Reading Police Chief David J.

Clark, as the main suspect in the death of his mother, 49-year-old Andria Hanafin.

“[I’m] just relieved,” said Grant Barton, who lives near the murder scene in Reading and said he and his wife were anxious because their daughter was in a local school while a fugitive was on the run.

The body of Andria Hanafin was found by her husband, Matthew Hanafin, who had returned to their Central Avenue home around midnight after working a 12-hour shift. He called the police around 12:38 a.m. Thursday, officials said. Andria Hanafin was pronounced dead shortly after police arrived.

Healey, Minogue take their shots

Trump’s shadow hangs over first debate

By Samantha J. Gross and Chris Van Buskirk

For the first time this election season, Governor Maura Healey and her Republican challenger Michael Minogue went one-on-one in a testy debate Thursday evening where President Trump seemed to feature as prominently as the candidates’ positions on issues.

The debate, the first of two in a week’s span, generated multiple tense moments between the two candidates, including one over a federal scholarship tax credit and another over the state’s controversial proposal to build a $2 billion courthouse in Springfield.

Healey referenced Trump dozens of times throughout the hour-long matchup in an effort to paint Minogue as a proxy for the Republican president, while Minogue, a first-time candidate, presented himself as a longtime registered independent willing to work with presidents from both parties.

Here are four takeaways from the debate, described by WBZ host and moderator Jon Keller as “a firehose from both directions.”

Building still under construction draws scorn in the North End

For Frank DePasquale, new ventures are old hat. The prominent restaurateur owns more than a half-dozen establishments in the North End, where he is known as the neighborhood’s unofficial mayor.

But sipping an espresso at Dolce, his gelato shop, on a brisk autumn morning, DePasquale said he’s been baffled and frustrated by the criticism swirling around his latest, biggest, and possibly last project — a building some critics have panned as jarringly modern, an eyesore, and worse.

“Anybody could critique it right now,” he said. “They look at it and they see an empty building. That’s like you’re putting a T-shirt on, and you still haven’t put on your suit and tie.”

The project at the entrance to the North End on Cross Street will bring shops, restaurants, and an Italian culinary school to what until recently was a block of blighted and va-

MARGARET HAMILTON 1936-2026

Pioneering programmer whose software rescued moon landing

By Bryan Marquard

In July 1969, two American astronauts on the Apollo 11 mission were minutes from becoming the first humans to set foot on the moon in July 1969 when alarms went off in their lunar module, threatening to scuttle a historic moment as it unfolded on live broadcasts around the world.

As it turned out, back on Earth, Margaret Hamilton had anticipated the crisis. A pioneering woman programmer at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Ms. Hamilton led the team that designed software for the lunar module’s computers.

Drawn to studying errors — “I thought of them as the enemy,” she told MIT Technology Review in 2019 — Ms. Hamilton was a master of foreseeing potential problems and creating fixes that immediately kicked in. That’s what happened on Apollo 11. The software override she developed directed computers to complete essential tasks while setting aside less important demands, allowing the lunar module to proceed.
