ICE told to halt most vehicle stops

Source says Trump team orders it after two deadly shootings

BIDDEFORD, Maine — Trump administration officials have told Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers to suspend most vehicle stops after two deadly shootings in little over a week, a person familiar with the matter confirmed Tuesday.

The order came a day after an ICE officer shot and killed a Colombian driver in Maine and a week after one shot and killed a motorist in Houston, renewing criticism of the agency's tactics during enforcement operations. The administration's enforcement efforts were widely condemned last winter after the killings of driver Renee Good and Alex Pretti in Minnesota. The suspension is not absolute, and there's room for exceptions when executing a criminal warrant or working with partner agencies, according to a person who spoke Tuesday on condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive law enforcement operations. Hundreds of people protested Tuesday in Maine over the killing Monday of Johan Sebastián Durán Guerrero, a 26-year-old Colombian national, by an ICE officer.

The Department of Homeland Security said the officer, "fearing for public safety," shot and killed Durán Guerrero while officers were watching the home of someone they believed was in the U.S. illegally and had a final order of removal from the country. It said in a post on X that when ICE tried to stop a car driven by someone coming from the home, the vehicle attempted to flee, and the officer fired his weapon. That was a change from how Maine Sen. Angus King described what he was told about the encounter hours earlier, when he said Homeland Security Secretary Markwayne Mullin told him the officer opened fire after the man tried to use his vehicle as a weapon. King said Mullin told him the officers were trying to serve an arrest warrant, but not for the man who was shot. In a scathing post on X, outgoing Colombian President Gustavo Petro called the shooting a targeted killing "at the hands of the U.S. govern-

Keeping officers cool

Chicago police officers buy water from Ronald Benson at his food stand near South Pulaski Road and West Fifth Avenue in the Garfield Park neighborhood on Tuesday. National Weather Service officials issued a heat advisory Tuesday for portions of north-central and northeast Illinois as well as northwest Indiana, with heat indexes forecast to hit around 100 degrees Tuesday and Wednesday, possibly continuing through the weekend.

Snelling reflects on his time as top cop

'Once you know it's time to go, then it's time to move on,' he says

By Sam Charles
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Chicago police Superintendent Larry Snelling is still finalizing his Wednesday dinner plans.

He hasn't thought about it much yet. There's still much to do, but there will be reason to celebrate. He won't join in a Champagne toast — Snelling doesn't drink alcohol — but he may allow himself one indulgence: a banana milkshake, his favorite dessert since he was a kid growing up in Englewood.

After that, he'll head to the gym like usual.

When Snelling finishes his day at Chicago Police Department headquarters Wednesday, he'll no longer be the boss. The 57-year-old is set to retire after nearly three years at the helm of the department he's been a part of for more than 30 years. Fred Waller, a longtime CPD supervisor who now works for the department as a civilian, will once again serve as interim superintendent.

In an interview with the Tribune last week, Snelling reflected on his time leading the department and some of the hallmarks of his administration — a sharp decline in gun violence; a renewed community-relations effort; a surge of migrants and, later, federal immigration officers; the 2024 Democratic National Convention; and CPD's ongoing consent decree reforms amid a greatly slowed officer-discipline system.

"You can't predict the crises that you're going to have to face, but as they pop up, you have to adjust," Snelling said. "You have to be fluid enough to step into those roles and make the best possible decision."

Cyclospora outbreak adds complexities to safe dining

Experts recommend following guidelines for safe food handling

By Zareen Syed
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

A parasite causing "explosive diarrhea" has caused widespread panic across the country, adding new complexities to safe food handling at home and worrying diners about ordering the wrong leafy green at a restaurant. Health experts in Chicago say caution is warranted either way, but suggest considering several key factors before raising the alarm.

"For patients or individuals that have really serious immune problems or problems with their gut health, I think it's reasonable to be really careful about what fresh produce you're eating right now, regardless of if it's at home or a restaurant," said Emily Landon, UChicago Medicine's executive medical director of infection prevention and control.

For Landon, this means avoiding fast-food chains and instead choosing to eat at home or at smaller, local restaurants, which she believes carry a lower risk because they handle a lower volume of food.

Cases of the cyclospora parasite are not uncommon in the summer months, she said, and while

Museum exhibit focuses on story of Filipino nurses in the US

By Lisa Schencker
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

In a small room in a museum downtown, a medium-size leather suitcase sits on the floor.

It's empty now, but nearly 50 years ago — as it crossed the Pacific Ocean from the Philippines to Chicago — it held textbooks, clothes, a prayer book and hopes for the future as a nurse in Illinois.

"Whenever I look at that, it comes back to me very clearly, what happened to me when I left the Philippines and came over here," said Brenda Vins, the owner of the suitcase, and a retired nurse who now lives in La Grange. "It's just that everything was in there for me — the reason I came."

The suitcase is one of dozens of items on display at the International Museum of Surgical Science in the Gold Coast neighborhood, as part of an exhibit called "Unheard Voices of Care: Filipino Nurses in America."

Filipino nurses have long had a sizable presence in American healthcare but the reasons
