

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

THURSDAY, AUGUST 6, 2026

Black kids face more scrutiny on residency

Milton more likely to investigate homes, in some cases using police

By John Hilliard
GLOBE STAFF

Tucker Elementary School sits on a tree-lined street in the largely white suburb of Milton, just blocks from the predominately Black but less affluent Boston neighborhood of Mattapan. Long a magnet for young families, Tucker has test scores nearly three times higher than those just over the city line.

Only Milton residents may attend Tucker, where a quarter of the students are Black.

Town officials have focused unusual attention on Tucker: Its children, particularly Black students, are more likely to be investigated for violating residency requirements than any other elementary school in Milton, according to a Globe analysis of public records and interviews with local families and school officials.

Black students accounted for 12 of the 15 Tucker students investigated during the school year that began in fall 2024.

Across all Milton schools, nearly half the children investigated that year were Black in a town where Black students account for less than 12 percent of enrollment.

And in the previous academic year, more than half of students expelled from Milton schools over residency issues were Black, including nine from Tucker.

Milton's tactics stand out compared to other

MILTON, Page A10

Judge in Mass. feeling more heat from Trump team

By Sean Cotter
GLOBE STAFF

A federal judge in Massachusetts is the latest member of the bench to clash with the Trump administration and other Republicans over immigration policies, with one top official publicly criticizing her and a GOP congressman reportedly calling for her impeachment.

The jurist is Judge Allison D. Burroughs, who's served on the bench of the federal District Court in Boston since 2014 and previously was a prosecutor in the US attorney's office here.

The tension revolves around her handling of one of the many cases challenging President Trump's move to terminate a government program called Temporary Protected Status that gives immigrants from countries facing violence or devastation such as natural disasters legal authority to be in the United States.

Many of the suits have been filed at federal District Court in Boston, and its judges as well as those on the appellate court above it are seen as more liberal and more willing to go against Trump.

In her most recent writings, on Tuesday, Burroughs described the administration's approach to ending TPS as one of "shameful cruelty," and a top lawyer for the government responded by labeling her as "grumpy."

JUDGE, Page A7

After Mich., Democrats vow to unite

Progressive's win in bitter primary still may leave deep scars

By Jim Puzzanghera and Sam Brodey
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — Democrats' fiercest internal battle of this election year ended on Wednesday, with a victory for the unabashed progressive candidate in Michigan's Senate primary.

But now the big challenge for Democrats starts: unifying around their nominee, Abdul El-Sayed. That has sweeping stakes for the party's chances to retake the Senate majority this November, as well as for its broader struggle to redefine the Democratic identity heading into the 2028 presidential election.

After such an intense primary, the work won't be easy.

El-Sayed and his top rival, the more moderate Representative Haley Stevens, slugged it out during a bitter and sometimes personal campaign. Despite polls predicting he'd win easily, El-Sayed ultimately prevailed by a narrow margin — roughly 1 percentage point — underscoring the divisions over the party's direction in President Trump's second term.

On Wednesday, the public message was all about coming together. Stevens called El-Sayed to concede and urged Democrats to unify behind the progressive public health official to defeat the Republican nominee, former representative Mike Rogers. State Senator Mallory McMorrow, who ran in the Democratic primary before dropping out last month, appeared with El-Sayed to endorse him.

"Whatever differences that we might have had in the primary, they pale in comparison to what unifies us," El-Sayed said Wednesday. "All of us have to come together to make sure that we never let Mike Rogers see the inside of the US Senate."

Democrats in Washington who had not supported El-Sayed also called for rallying around him.

MICHIGAN, Page A6

TAKING A LICKING

PAT GREENHOUSE/GLOBE STAFF

Eastleigh Farm in Framingham is having a moment with its "cow safaris" after a video went viral online, and daily attendance at the safaris has shot up from fewer than 70 people to as many as 600. The farm, which operates as a bovine sanctuary, has a clear star — Ferdinand — who got a piece of bread while Jason Cope gave him a wide berth. B1.

104 Massachusetts cases reported in July

147 Massachusetts cases reported this year

More cyclospora cases here, but no alarm

By Jason Laughlin
GLOBE STAFF

Cases of cyclosporiasis, a parasitic infection that causes severe gastrointestinal symptoms, have spiked in Massachusetts, with 104 new ones reported in July.

The total number of cases reported so far this year, 147, is the most in Massachusetts since 2019, when state health officials traced 211 cases to contamination in several restaurants, state data showed.

That year's count, as well as the current one, are outliers: cases in Massachusetts have not otherwise exceeded 100 in a decade, even after hospitals began using a new testing panel sensitive to cyclospora, the parasite that causes the infection.

Despite the surge in cases, state health officials noted the number here remains modest in the context of a national outbreak of cyclospora, said Dr. Catherine Brown, the state epidemiologist. She described the increase in Massachusetts as noteworthy but not yet alarming.

"Look at numbers of cases other states are reporting," Brown said, noting Missouri has identified nearly 1,100 since May. "It's hard for me to get super concerned about what we're seeing so far."

Federal officials have tied the national outbreak to iceberg lettuce from Mexico as a source of the widespread outbreak.

Taylor Farms, a produce company identified as a likely distributor of contaminated food, recalled all lettuce sourced from central Mexico on July 17, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported. The agency has said other sources, including other produce brands, restaurants, and retailers, could be tied to the outbreak as the investigation continues.

Among Massachusetts cases where the source of infection could be traced, about 20 percent originated overseas. Some others were traced to other states, Brown said, though she did not provide a number. Two cases were reported before May, when the current outbreak first appeared in the US.

Brown said some cyclosporiasis cases had been traced to Taylor Farms lettuce sold at food service locations in Massachusetts. Brown did

CYCLOSPORA, Page A7

Massachusetts now has a sweeping immigration law designed to thwart President Trump's nationwide deportation surges. B1.

Using AI to create child sexual abuse material would be criminalized under an amendment passed by the state Senate. D1.

The family's former nanny testified that Lindsay Clancy was a loving mother struggling with postpartum issues. B1.

No one has yet reported any obvious signs of the impact caused when part of a SpaceX rocket slammed into the moon earlier in the week. A2.

The Red Sox won their seventh straight game and 30th out of 35 as their amazing run continued with a 4-0 shutout of the White Sox. C1.

Sticking around

Thursday: Humidity on way up. High 87-92. Low 73-78.

Friday: More of the same.

Sunrise: 5:42 Sunset: 7:58

Weather and Comics, D5-6.

VOL. 310, NO. 37

Suggested retail price
$4.00

0 947725 4

31411

At just 24, a record-setting triple threat

Sean Bannon, a Winchester native, is the youngest person to finish the Enduroman Arch 2 Arc, from London to Paris.

By Amin Touri
GLOBE STAFF

Sean Bannon's final summer before starting medical school was like anyone else's: some time in the pool, a research job at a hospital . . . and finishing the world's hardest triathlon.

In July, Bannon, a 24-year-old from Winchester, became the youngest person to finish the Enduroman Arch 2 Arc, a nearly 300-mile journey from London to Paris.

Bannon grew up swimming and threw himself into triathlons during the COVID-19 pandemic. As an undergrad at UMass, he turned his attention to long-distance open-water swimming.

He had long been interested in completing the 21 miles across the English Channel and started reaching out to "pilots" — operators of the guide boats for Channel swimmers — in 2022.

"They book out two years in advance, so it was kind of weird ... kind of like the dentist where they're like, 'You know, what are you doing this week in two years?'" he said. "Might as well send an e-mail and see."

Bannon first swam the Channel in 2024, when he was just 22. That's when he learned of the Enduroman, the grueling triathlon from London to Paris that counts the swim across the Channel as one of its three legs.

The course starts at London's famous Marble Arch, with an 80-mile run to the shores of Dover on England's southeast coast. Then comes the swim across the unpredictable English Channel to the French port of Calais. Finally, there is an 180-mile bike ride through the countryside to reach the Arc de Triomphe in Paris.

TRIATHLON, Page C6