

The Washington Post

Prices may vary in areas outside metropolitan Washington.

RE V1 V2 V3 V4

Shower 45/34 • Tomorrow: Mostly cloudy 38/26 B18

Democracy Dies in Darkness

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 2026 • $4

Family disputes DHS report on shooting

Minn. man's mother says he was shot as he opened door for a housemate

BY ANGIE ORELLANA
HERNANDEZ, MOLLY
HENNESSY-FISKE
AND JUSTINE MCDANIEL

The family of a man shot in the leg by an ICE officer in Minneapolis on Wednesday has disputed key elements of the Department of Homeland Security's version of the incident, saying the shooting happened at the door of the man's house as he let his housemate inside, rather than out in the street during a scuffle.

The Department of Homeland Security has said an ICE officer shot Julio Cesar Sosa-Celis as he was assaulting the officer "with a shovel or broom stick." The agency said the incident began when the officer attempted to stop Sosa-Celis in his car, and that Sosa-Celis tried to flee and then got into an altercation with the officer outside, joined by two housemates.

But Sosa-Celis's mother, citing an account from her son, said DHS had actually been pursuing one of his housemates, who Sosa-Celis let into their house just before the shooting. Alicia Celis said her son made no mention of anyone running from the house to attack ICE officers.

A Facebook Live video reviewed by The Washington Post includes people at the house telling 911 dispatchers that the shooting happened as the men closed the door at the residence. Another video includes Sosa-Celis men-

SEE SHOOTING ON A4

Subpoenas: DOJ launches probe into Walz, Minneapolis mayor. A4

MARCO BELLO/REUTERS

Protesters rally Friday in Caracas, Venezuela, to demand the release of captured president Nicolás Maduro and his wife, Cilia Flores. CIA Director John Ratcliffe met with interim president Delcy Rodríguez in Caracas on Thursday as the sides search for a way forward.

Mistrust, mixed signals preceded Fed criminal case

BY SALVADOR RIZZO
AND ANDREW ACKERMAN

The battle between the Federal Reserve and Trump administration prosecutors accelerated over the past few weeks amid mixed signals and mutual suspicion, according to interviews with a half-dozen figures with knowledge of both sides of the dispute.

Late last month, Fed officials grew concerned that the Justice Department was preparing a criminal case against them when they received two casually worded emails from a prosecutor working for Jeanine Pirro, the Probe followed criticism from Trump, then a DOJ email to 'hop on a call'

U.S. attorney for D.C. The messages sought a meeting or phone call to discuss renovations at the central bank's headquarters, according to three people familiar with the matter, who like most others interviewed spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss an open investigation.

The emails, sent Dec. 19 and

Dec. 29, came from Assistant U.S. Attorney Carlton Davis, a political appointee in Pirro's office whose background includes work for House Oversight Committee Chairman James Comer (R-Kentucky), the people said.

The messages struck Fed officials as breezy in tone.

"Happy to hop on a call," one of the missives read in part.

The casual approach generating suspicions at the Fed. Chair Jerome H. Powell, who by that point had sustained months of criticism from President Donald Trump and his allies over the central bank's handling of interest rates, retained outside counsel at the law firm Williams & Connolly. Fed officials opted not to respond to Davis, choosing to avoid informal engagement on a matter that could carry criminal implications, according to a person familiar with the decision.

That led Pirro, a former Fox News host and longtime personal friend of Trump's, to conclude that the Fed was stonewalling and had something to hide, according to a Justice Department official familiar with the matter.

"The claim that, 'Oh, they didn't think it was a big deal' is

SEE FED ON A7

Maduro's top aides warm up to Trump

REGIME PIVOTS TO PRO-AMERICA ERA

Analysts say goodwill is campaign to keep power

This article is by Ana Vanessa Herrero, Anthony Faiola, Samantha Schmidt, Evan Halper and Warren P. Strobel

CARACAS, VENEZUELA — Last month, as U.S. forces were massing off Venezuela, government officials here — the political heirs to Hugo Chávez, founder of the country's socialist state — vowed American intervention would ignite 100 years of war. "If they attack Venezuela," one senior official said, "not a single drop of oil can leave here for the United States."

But since the U.S. military's stealth operation Jan. 3 to capture President Nicolás Maduro, the leaders of a newly pragmatic Chavismo seem to have walked through a looking glass to welcome Los Yanquis with open arms.

Two countries with leaders of sharply different ideologies are moving toward the creation of a neo-colony here in South America, with Washington holding the purse strings (and all the cards). The Venezuelans, whether motivated by the threat of more U.S. force or an assessment that a diplomatic reset with their longtime nemesis to the north is now the best — if not only — course, are moving quickly to reestablish formal ties while working on legislation that could grease American investment in the key oil sector.

CIA Director John Ratcliffe met with interim president Delcy Rodríguez in Caracas on Thursday

SEE VENEZUELA ON A12

Psychiatric disorders study could transform treatment

Scientists found the 14 conditions examined are linked by hundreds of genetic variants

BY MARK JOHNSON

A sweeping new study of psychiatric and genetic records has the potential to change treatment for millions of psychiatric patients, finding that many conditions involve similar genes and may not need to be treated as distinct illnesses.

In essence, the study suggests that bolstering the traditional emphasis on patient behavior with a deeper understanding of the biology of mental illness could lead to better treatment.

Published in Nature, the paper addresses the boundaries psychiatry uses to separate similar conditions like bipolar disorder and schizophrenia. The research also suggests that linking genes to the brain processes they influence will provide psychiatrists with greater insight into their patients, and guide researchers toward new therapies.

The findings could also spare patients the burden of carrying multiple different diagnoses that require an assortment of different pills.

Half of all people will experience a psychiatric disorder in their lifetime, according to a 2010 study in the journal Psychiatry. More than half of all psychiatric patients will be diagnosed with a second or third disorder, and about 15 percent will be diagnosed with at least four disorders, according to a 2018 study in the American Journal of Psychiatry.

"If you are someone who's being told that you have four separate things, that can lead to a lot of pessimism about how this therapeutic process is going to go," said Andrew Grotzinger, one of the authors of the new study and an assistant professor of psychology and neuroscience at University of Colorado Boulder.

"The kind of medical metaphor I'd offer is that if you went to the doctor with a runny nose, cough and sore throat, and you got diagnosed with runny nose disorder, cough disorder and sore throat disorder, and prescribed three separate pills, we would consider that sort of a medical misstep."

To produce the Nature study, a large international team of researchers spent five years analyzing records from more than 1 million people diagnosed with one of 14 psychiatric disorders, and 5 million people with no such diagnosis.

The scientists found that genetic similarities among the 14 disorders suggest that they fall into five essential categories: substance use disorders; internalizing conditions such as depression, anxiety and post-traumatic stress disorder; neurodevelopmental conditions such as

SEE DISORDERS ON A8

EVGENIY MALOLETKA/AP

Trump's threats turn economic

A Danish soldier in Nuuk, Greenland. The Danish territory expanded its military presence as Donald Trump said he'd impose tariffs on nations that object to the U.S. annexing it. Story, A13

As U.S. asserts its might, China offers a contrast

BY SIMON ELEGANT
AND HUIYEE CHIEW

The political upheaval in Venezuela and Iran — including military strikes, threatened and realized, by the Trump administration — could provide opportunities for China to bolster its claim to being a reliable, stabilizing alternative to a U.S.-led world order, analysts say.

The U.S. military's surprise operation in Venezuela led to the capture of President Nicolás Maduro and his removal to the United States to face criminal charges, abruptly ending the rule of a leader Beijing had backed for years with loans, oil deals and diplomatic support.

In Iran, mass protests were followed by a bloody crackdown, raising fresh questions about the durability of the Islamic republic and prompting President Donald Trump to promise the Iranian people that the U.S. would come to their aid. The Pentagon began relocating personnel and equipment away from key facilities in the region, but Trump then appeared to step back from taking military action.

Beijing used the opportunity

SEE CHINA ON A11

Trump puts allies on panel set to review ballroom plans

BY JONATHAN EDWARDS
AND DAN DIAMOND

President Donald Trump has installed four allies on a federal commission set to review his White House ballroom plan, including its former chief architect — his latest move to secure rapid approval for the controversial project.

Trump appointed architect James McCrery II and art critic Roger Kimball to the Commission of Fine Arts this week, according to court documents filed late Thursday. Trump also tapped two officials for the panel who already serve in his government: Mary Anne Carter, who chairs the National Endowment for the Arts, and Matthew Taylor, an official serving at the National Endowment for the Humanities, according to the White House.

The fine arts commission, which is charged by Congress with advising the president on major design projects in Washington, is one of two independent federal agencies scheduled to review the ballroom and weigh in on its size, design and other aesthetics. The National Capital Planning Commission, which focuses on urban planning, is also reviewing the project, which would be the most significant change to the White House in decades.

SEE ARTS ON A9

IN THE NEWS

A new path Democratic leaders have targeted six seats they can flip in the midterms, giving them a viable shot at retaking the Senate. A3

Rising electricity costs A bipartisan proposal unveiled at the White House would push tech companies to fund their own power needs as consumer anger over utility bills mounts. A6

THE NATION Trump, looking toward the midterms, touted a $50 billion rural health care program. A2
A judge lambasted the administration's actions in detaining pro-Palestinian students. A2

THE WORLD Spurred by Trump's tariffs and threats, Canada and China forge their own trade deal. A10
A Nobel laureate gifted her Peace Prize. Officials say the title cannot be transferred. A13

THE ECONOMY Electricity rates for residential users have risen sharply, while commercial users have seen more modest increases. A15
A new two-drug regimen has shown promise in treating multiple myeloma, an aggressive bone-marrow cancer. A8

STYLE HBO's "A Knight of the Seven Kingdoms" is a lighter take on the realm of Game of Thrones. B1
SPORTS Candace Buckner writes on fans' inalienable right to boo. Sure, go ahead. But know those boos can come with consequences. B7

THE REGION As Virginia Gov. Glenn Youngkin leaves office, his education legacy is a topic of debate. B13
The state Senate in Virginia voted to let voters decide whether to give lawmakers power to draw new congressional districts, among other big-issue measures. B13

BUSINESS NEWS.....A15
COMICS.....B4
OBITUARIES.....B16
OPINION PAGES.....A16
TELEVISION.....B6
WORLD NEWS.....A10

CONTENT © 2026
The Washington Post
Year 149, No. 54464

