

State’s SNAP benefits may be delayed

Newsom says food assistance could be disrupted if federal shutdown continues.

By Kevin Rector

Gov. Gavin Newsom has issued a stark warning that food assistance benefits for millions of low-income Californians could be delayed starting Nov. 1 if the ongoing federal shutdown does not end by Thursday.

The benefits, issued under the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, or SNAP, and formerly called food stamps, include federally funded benefits loaded onto CalFresh cards. They support some 5.5 million Californians.

Newsom blamed the potential SNAP disruption — and the shutdown more broadly — on President Trump and slammed the timing of the potential cutoff just as the Thanksgiving holiday approaches.

“Trump’s failure to open the federal government is now endangering people’s lives and making basic needs like food more expensive — just as the holidays arrive,” Newsom said Monday. “It is long past time for Republicans in Congress to grow a spine, stand up to Trump and deliver for the American people.”

The White House responded by blaming the shutdown on Democrats, as it has done before.

Abigail Jackson, a White House spokeswoman, said the “Democrats’ decision to shut down the government is hurting Americans across the country,” and that Democrats “can choose to reopen the government at any point” by voting for a continuing resolution to fund the government as budget negotiations continue, something she said they repeatedly did during the Biden administration. [See SNAP, A14]

GOP senators lunch with Trump

The president hosts Republicans at the White House amid the federal shutdown. NATION, A7

ALLEN J. SCHABEN Los Angeles Times

CONSTRUCTION workers rebuild a home with an ocean view amid cleared lots in Malibu on Tuesday.

Months after fire, Malibu is suffering an identity crisis

Wood frames are rising from the ashes of burned-out lots in Pacific Palisades, signaling the start of a new era for the fire-torn community. But down the road in Malibu, the scene is bleak.

Cars wind through a gauntlet of traffic cones and caution tape. Sweeping ocean views are sullied by hollow shells of graffiti-tagged homes and miles of chain-link fencing.

Nearly a year after the Palisades fire, one of Southern California’s most iconic communities is frozen in place.

In Altadena and Pacific Palisades, the two communities hit hardest by the January fires, there are rebuilding permits aplenty. The city of L.A., which is handling most permits in the Locals leave.

Home values decline.
Rebuilding might take more than a decade.

By Jack Flemming

Palisades, has issued 801 — around 43% of the total applications received, according to data from the state’s rebuilding dashboard. L.A. County, which is handling most permits in Altadena, has issued 577 — around 26% of the total applications received.

So far, Malibu has issued four — about 2% of the total applications received.

“It’s depressing,” said Abe Roy, a Malibu resident and professional builder.

In May, Roy was appointed as the city’s first rebuild ambassador, a volunteer role created to find solutions to administrative obstacles and speed up the rebuild. He publicly [See Malibu, A14]

Warner confirms it’s now seeking a buyer

Move comes weeks after Paramount made an offer to acquire the entire company.

By Meg James

Warner Bros. Discovery has officially acknowledged the company is up for sale, marking the third time in a decade that its storied assets have been on the auction block.

The company’s board announced Tuesday that it has initiated “a review of strategic alternatives ... in light of unsolicited interest the Company has received from multiple parties for both the entire company and Warner Bros.”

The Ellison family, which owns Paramount, started the bidding late last month. With financial backing from his father, Larry Ellison, David Ellison is looking to build an entertainment juggernaut. The family and RedBird Capital Partners finalized their takeover of Paramount in August, and has since made at least one offer for its rival. Paramount wants to buy the entire company, including its basic cable channels that include CNN, TNT, Food Network and HGTV. Both bids, however, have been rejected by Warner Bros. Discovery’s board, said a source familiar with the matter who was not authorized to comment. Cable giant Comcast, which owns NBCUniversal, also is said to be circling.

Warner Bros. Discovery stock soared nearly 11% on Tuesday to $20.33 a share, valuing the company at $50 billion. That’s the highest level since Discovery swallowed the larger WarnerMedia in April 2022.

The company did not disclose the other entities that have expressed interest in buying the company as a whole, or its stable of assets, including premium cable channel HBO, the HBO Max streaming service and the legendary Warner Bros. film and television studio and its campus in Burbank.

“It’s no surprise that the significant value of our portfolio is receiving increased recognition by others in the market,” Chief Executive [See Warner Bros., A10]

Vance touts Gaza truce’s progress

In his visit to Israel, the vice president also noted the ‘very hard’ work that awaits.

By Renata Brito, Melanie Lidman and Samy Magdy

KIRYAT GAT, Israel — Vice President JD Vance on Tuesday called progress in Gaza’s fragile ceasefire better than anticipated but acknowledged during his Israel visit that challenges remain, including disarming Hamas and rebuilding a land devastated by two years of war.

Nathan Howard Pool Photo

VICE PRESIDENT JD Vance, shown Tuesday in Tel Aviv, is expected to stay in the region until Thursday.

Vance noted flare-ups of violence in recent days but said the ceasefire between Israel and the militant group Hamas that began Oct. 10 is going “better than I expected.” The Trump administration’s Middle East envoy, Steve Witkoff, added that “we are exceeding where we thought we would be at this time.”

They visited a new center in Israel for civilian and military cooperation as questions persist over the long-term plan for peace, including when and how an international security force will deploy to Gaza and who will govern the Palestinian territory after the war. [See Mideast, A4]

Ethan Swope For The Times

PEOPLE observe at the site in South L.A. where an ICE agent shot two people.

ICE agents’ use of force faces scrutiny after L.A. shooting

By Ruben Vives, Richard Winton, Brittny Mejia and Rachel Uranga

An ICE agent wounded a deputy U.S. marshal and a TikTok streamer in a South Los Angeles enforcement operation that went awry Tuesday, raising new questions about federal tactics that have faced growing scrutiny both in L.A. and Chicago.

The incident unfolded around 9 a.m. in a dense immigrant community where, according to Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Tricia McLaughlin, federal agents were carrying out “a targeted enforcement traffic stop” of an undocumented immigrant who “previously escaped from custody” and “attempted to evade arrest yet again.”

During the stop, she said in a written statement, the unauthorized immigrant “weaponized his vehicle and began ramming the law enforcement vehicle in an attempt to flee.”

“Fearing for the safety of the public and law enforcement, our officers followed their training and fired defensive shots,” she said.

Witnesses said a TikTok streamer known as Richard [See ICE, A8]

Trump seeking personal payout

President says federal government owes him damages over Justice Department investigations. NATION, A7

Inside Brink’s heist inquiry

Cellphone data and a serendipitous turn led authorities to suspects in the 2022 big-rig crime. CALIFORNIA, B1

Blue Jays take on L.A. in Series

Nine concerns for the Dodgers, who will play Toronto in the World Series on Friday night. SPORTS, B10

Fire bill due for homeowners

Multiple insurers receive OK to charge policyholders for costs of January disasters. BUSINESS, A9

Weather

Partly sunny
L.A. Basin: 71/57. B6

Markets A11

Opinion Voices A12

For the latest news, go to latimes.com.

Political scandals alter the vibe of South Lake Tahoe

Mayor resigns after theft at church. Mayor pro tem faces charges in brewery incident.

By Hannah Fry

With its scenic vistas and clear alpine waters, South Lake Tahoe long has been a destination for outdoor enthusiasts, vacationers and wealthy Californians looking for a reprieve from city life.

It’s a place where people seem more eager to strike up a conversation about hiking, boating or skiing — depending on the season — than about the often-dull arena of local politics.

That changed after South Lake Tahoe Mayor Tamara Wallace sent the local newspaper a letter this month confessing she’d stolen money from the Presbyterian church where she’d worked as an office manager and bookkeeper for seven years.

Then she resigned.

Adding to the local drama, news broke a day after Wallace’s revelation that the town’s mayor pro tem, Cody Bass, had been arrested following a recent early morning incident at a brewery. Bass was charged with misdemeanor trespassing and harassment, according to the Douglas County Sheriff’s Office and the Douglas County district attorney’s office.

In a statement posted on Facebook, Bass denied any wrongdoing and said that he has “acted with integrity.”

“I will absolutely not be stepping down from my position on the City Council,” he wrote. “I am committed to going through the due process to prove my innocence.”

The one-two punch of political scandal has left residents questioning just who they’d put in charge of running their city of 21,000, which is grappling with issues such as housing affordability and how to stay safe amid the threat of wildfire.

In recent years, South Lake Tahoe has seen an in- [See Tahoe, A8]