

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

W E D N E S D A Y , O C T O B E R 2 2 , 2 0 2 5

Trump wants $230m compensation for probes

Demands payment from Justice Dept., which is now led by his former lawyers

By Devlin Barrett and Tyler Pager
NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON — President Trump is demanding that the Justice Department pay him about $230 million in compensation for the federal investigations into him, according to people familiar with the matter, who added that any settlement might ultimately be approved by senior department officials who defended him or those in his orbit.

The situation has no parallel in American history, as Trump, a presidential candidate, was pursued by federal law enforcement and eventually won the election, taking over the very government that must now review his claims. It is also the starkest example yet of potential ethical conflicts created by installing the president's former lawyers atop the Justice Department.

Trump submitted complaints through an administrative claim process that often is the precursor to lawsuits. The first claim, lodged in late 2023, seeks damages for a number of purported violations of his rights, including the FBI and special counsel investigation into Russian election tampering and possible connections to the 2016 Trump campaign, according to people familiar with the matter. They spoke on the condition of anonymity because the claim has not been made public.

The second complaint, filed in the summer of 2024, accuses the FBI of violating Trump's privacy by searching Mar-a-Lago, his club and residence in Florida, in 2022 for classified documents. It also accuses the Justice Department of malicious prosecution in charging him with mishandling sensitive records after he left office.

Asked about the issue at the White House after this article published, the president said, "I was damaged very greatly, and any money I would get, I would give to

TRUMP, Page A7

GOP tests limits with shutdown politics

Taking money from blue states for Trump's priorities raises some legal questions

By Tal Kopan
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — When funding lapses and the federal government shuts down, the White House always has a degree of latitude to dictate how, and whom, the impacts hit. And President Trump is using that leverage to maximum effect.

Trump and his top budget official, Russell Vought, are using their authority to inflict or spare pain where they deem necessary, such as by choosing which government services remain operational and which employees are paid. And in a shutdown that is by its very nature political, they are making their motivations clear.

"We're not closing up Republican programs, because we think they work, so the Democrats are getting killed," Trump said last week. "We are closing up Democrat programs that we disagree with, and they're never going to open again."

To some extent, such partisan decision-making is always a feature of shutdowns, though few politicians say so out loud. But in what's becoming a well-worn tactic, Trump is also testing the boundaries of the administration's legal authority

SHUTDOWN DAY 22

10
Failed Senate votes

Sept. 19
Date of last session

594,048
Workers furloughed

35 days
Longest-ever shutdown

SHUTDOWN, Page A6

KEEP ON ROWING

The Head of the Charles regatta last weekend featured all kinds of athletes, including a team made up mostly of people in their 80s. The team, now in its fourth year, has grown beyond the expectations of its mastermind, Catherine Saarela, with more than 12 rowers attending practices. Above, Peter McGowan, 82, kept his shoes around his neck. B1.

Monica Tibbits-Nutt, the former transportation secretary, said she had considered leaving for months and wanted to step back. B1.

Attorney General Andrea Campbell is running for a second term as the state's top law enforcement officer. B1.

Watertown Mall will remain as a shopping center after plans to replace it with lab space fell through. B5.

The Celtics open their season tonight with greatly diminished expectations after the loss of the injured Jayson Tatum and some other big names. C1.

Here are 17 great slices in Greater Boston to mark National Pizza Month. G1.

'I'd walk around towns that were normally . . . jumping with activity, and they were a shadow of what they normally are.'

ALYSSA THOMPSON, who rents out her family's beach house in Old Orchard Beach, Maine

STAYING AWAY FROM THE USA

Global tourism's doing just fine but things are different here

By Christopher Muther
GLOBE STAFF

ROME — The World Travel and Tourism Council was in full celebratory mode at its annual Global Summit earlier this month. It opened with famed tenor Andrea Bocelli singing the Italian national anthem, followed by an address from Italian Prime Minister Giorgia Meloni focused on the importance of tourism to Italy.

There was a good reason for all the pomp and circumstance.

"Travel and tourism are booming," said Gloria Guevara, president

Washington, D.C., has a very strange feel these days for many.

and CEO of the WTTC. "It's booming everywhere."

Everywhere, but with one notable exception: the United States. Tourist spending here is projected to decline by more than $12 billion in 2025. So while global tourism surges ahead with double-digit growth, the United States is flat-lining. The number of inbound tourists has fallen nearly every month since President Trump was sworn into office in January. According to the WTTC, international visitor spending in the country is projected to decline by 7

TOURISM, Page A10

Stalemate could have broad effects on economy

By Lydia DePillis
NEW YORK TIMES

The economic effect of past government shutdowns has been straightforward. The economy loses some activity for a few weeks, then gains it back after the government reopens. The net cost is basically zero.

This time, the math may not be so benign.

As Washington's stalemate continues into its fourth week with no end in sight, it's looking like this could become one of America's longest funding lapses. During the previous record-holder, a 35-day closure in 2018, Congress passed enough appropriations bills to keep more of the government funded. This time, none have been passed.

And the White House is attempting to lay off thousands of people and threatening to withhold back pay for furloughed workers, despite a 2019 law requiring that they be paid. "That would obviously make it a larger macroeconomic impact," said Michael Zdinak, a director on the US economics team at S&P Global Market Intelligence.

Then there are the services those workers ar-

ECONOMY, Page A6

Belichick's fall takes a page out of the Bard's playbook

By Beth Teitell
GLOBE STAFF

The Lear comparisons are mounting, but even so, Bill Belichick is not some mad, be-hoodied king, wandering a desolate North Carolina gridiron as a media storm rages, railing against those who have betrayed him, wounded and wailing into his headset, "I am a man more sinn'd against than sinning."

At least not yet.

But his hubris is threatening to bend his story arc toward tragedy. The man who once ruled the NFL, nay, the world, is forced to suffer the slings and arrows of those he may consider fools. They mocketh him for surrendering his kingdom to youth, and harpeth on the Tar Heels' disastrous season, and pointeth out that Tom Brady's record without Belichick was better than Belichick's without Brady's.

The words "Shakespearean figure" are getting harder to avoid.

For decades Belichick was the one who called the plays. But now he's in one, and finds himself a player who's lost control of his storyline. Which character is he? With drama-ridden headlines about his future mounting, the Globe put a question to scholars (of both the coach and the Bard).

"Lear, Timon, Prospero, and Titus come first to mind," said Ralph Alan Cohen, cofounder of the American Shakespeare Center. But, he added upon reflection, "I think 'Coriolanus' is the best parallel."

Coriolanus, a Roman warrior, was celebrated for his many victories, but unpopular for his disdain of the people and of the power structure — aka the press and the owners of the Patriots, respectively, said Cohen, the author of "ShakesFear and How to Cure It."

But rather than being the one who's banished, Cohen points out, Coriolanus tries to grab control:

BELICHICK, Page A10

At this year's game in February, Bill Belichick sported his Super Bown rings as he walked the red carpet.

Drip dry

Wednesday: A little rain. High 63-68. Low 45-50.

Thursday: Breezy, a few clouds. High 59-64. Low 45-50.

High tide: 12:18 a.m., 12:24 p.m.
Sunrise: 7:05    Sunset: 5:51

Weather and Comics, G6-7.

VOL. 308, NO. 114

*

Suggested retail price
$4.00

0 947725 4