WASHINGTON — A 10 percent reduction in flights at the nation's busiest airports starting Friday is the latest attempt by the Trump administration to force congressional Democrats to end the record-long government shutdown.

But a promise of chaos at the airports was not enough to get a deal off the ground — at least not yet.

Widespread flight delays on the East Coast provided the final impetus to end the 2018-19 shutdown. And while lawmakers from both parties said Thursday that they were worried about the impact of significant flight delays at Boston's Logan International Airport and 39 other high-volume airports, lawmakers didn't appear to be any closer to a resolution as the partisan finger-pointing continued.

"The Democrats need to stop the pain and suffering that they're causing," said Wyoming

Travelers are bracing for disruption and confusion at Logan and dozens of other high-traffic airports across the country on Friday as federal officials imposed an unprecedented reduction in plane traffic as a safety measure during the government shutdown.

The specific flights that would be affected by the 10 percent reduction were still unclear as of Thursday evening, and Logan officials referred travelers to their individual airlines for more information.

But, "it will not be done elegantly," aviation industry analyst Robert Mann Jr predicted. "It will be done with an ax as opposed to a scalpel."

The nation's four largest carriers, American Airlines, Delta Air Lines, Southwest Airlines, and United Airlines, said the disruption would be limited this weekend. Most customers will not be affected, they said, and travelers who want to change or cancel a flight for a refund can do so.

"While it is sudden, it is definitely not chaotic," said David Kinzelman, United's chief customer officer. Knowing the location and scale of the

Judge in R.I. orders SNAP benefits to be paid in full

PROVIDENCE — The deepening crisis over food benefits for 42 million low-income and disabled people took another dramatic turn Thursday when a federal judge in Rhode Island ordered the Trump administration to immediately provide recipients with their full allotments for November.

Chief Judge John J. McConnell Jr. of the US District Court in Rhode Island ordered the Department of Agriculture to tap other sources of money under its control, such as one for child nutrition programs, to provide the entire monthly payment for the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, known as SNAP, by Friday. Earlier this week, the administration said it would fund a partial amount for the month. But as of Thursday, that partial funding had not yet been released to some states.

"Without SNAP funding for the month of November, 16 million children are immediately at risk of going hungry," McConnell said. "This should never happen in America. In fact, it's

Some find virtual schools bring real benefits

Sophie Leonard rolls out of bed in her pajamas most mornings, anywhere from 8 to 10 a.m., before she starts school at her desk across the room.

Leonard, 17, likes to begin with art class — it's fun — but over the course of a day, she might cross off on her to-do list everything from college applications to self-taped auditions for film and TV roles.

Most of the time, Leonard, a student at the statewide public school Greater Commonwealth Virtual School, doesn't go further than the kitchen table of her Southborough home to work. But virtual school's flexible schedule helped Leonard even more last year, when she booked a part on the Apple TV+ show "Platonic" and she had to do her coursework on set in Los Angeles between scenes with Seth Rogen and Rose Byrne.

"I'm able to keep myself on a schedule, motivate myself, and get things in on time," said Leonard. "I like having the flexibility."

While most of the state — and country — has spent the past five years trying to forget virtual learning as quickly as possible, an increasing number of families such as Leonard's are flocking to virtual schools.

Alongside the half-dozen local district virtual schools, Leonard's school, GCVS for short, is joined by one other statewide public school, the TEC Connections Academy, or TECCA. A third, the Felix School,
