Air-Traffic Cuts Slam Travelers, Raise Pressure to End Shutdown

Airlines begin to cancel flights at 40 hubs just ahead of holiday travel season

Airlines and travelers scrambled to review flight plans after U.S. transportation officials decided to throttle commercial air traffic starting

By Allison Pohle, Victoria Albert and Lindsay Wise

Friday, a move that has ramped up pressure on lawmakers and the president to end the government shutdown.

Transportation Secretary

Sean Duffy said that traffic at 40 major airports would be reduced as much as 10% as a safety measure prompted by the shutdown. He has said that while the country's air-travel system is safe, the reduction starting Friday is aimed at keeping it that way.

Air-traffic controllers and airport security agents aren't being paid in the shutdown, which federal officials said has led to stretched staffing, flight delays and long security lines just before the busy Thanksgiving holiday season.

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill floated proposals to end the longest government shutdown ever as a widening political and economic fallout has spurred interest in reaching a deal. An agreement to end the shutdown could involve votes on a package of three full-year spending bills for military construction and veterans, agriculture and the legislative branch, along with a stopgap measure that would reopen the entire government through at least December.

The Federal Aviation Administration and Transportation Department emergency order outlines a gradual increase in flight cuts.

A 4% reduction in traffic will take effect Friday. The reductions will reach 6% by Tuesday, Nov. 11, 8% by Nov. 13, and 10% by Nov. 14. The order also limits commercial space launches to non-peak hours and prohibits some parachute operations.

Some of the nation's busiest airports are among those the FAA targeted for flight capacity cuts, including those in Atlanta, Chicago and New York.

"To put that in perspective, a 4% reduction in key markets represents approximately 100 flights, a level we routinely manage during standard weather or irregular operational events," the memo said.

Some airline industry officials compared managing the planned reduction to dealing

Mamdani Faces A Complex Reality

NYC bureaucracy, budget issues and Trump's ire lie ahead for mayor-elect

By JOSHUA CHAFFIN AND JAMES FANELLI

NEW YORK—The capacious Bohemian Hall & Beer Garden in Astoria, Queens, had been swelling for hours with chanting—and drinking—among socialists. At 9:36 p.m. it erupted.

"Mamdani is my mayor! Mamdani is my mayor!" a young woman shouted again and again, as if confirming to herself that the improbable had become reality: A little-known, Uganda-born, Muslim state assemblyman and avowed socialist was elected New York City mayor.

By daylight, the harsh reality confronting Zohran Mamdani after his fantastical rise was apparent. The 34-year-old, with scant managerial experience, will have to manage a famously ungovernable city in all of its vast

When These Jockeys Are Racing, Saddle Up for Family Drama

Siblings Dylan and Katie Davis are building a rivalry—and making things awkward

By LETTIE TEAGUE

Horse racing has a rich history of rivalries, from Seabiscuit and War Admiral to Affirmed and Alydar. But for family drama, nothing beats the one between two jockeys named Davis.

Dylan Davis is one of the top riders in the country. His sister, Katie, is rapidly rising through racing's ranks. That has put the siblings in direct competition in hundreds of races at one of New York's most elite tracks. Dylan, 31, wins more often but Katie, 33, has bested her brother plenty of times.

The budding rivalry is complicating family dynamics. When Katie began racing at Aqueduct in Queens, N.Y., where Dylan was on his way to stardom, her brother was quick to offer advice. "Be more patient," he said of her race strategy. As Katie began winning, the advice stopped.

The two profess their love for each other. But when they get to the starting gate, says Dylan, "she's just the competition that I have to beat."

At the center of it all is the family patriarch, Robbie Davis, Please turn to page A2

Ford Weighs Ending Electric F-150 Truck

By SHARON TERLEP

Ford Motor executives are in active discussions about scrapping the electric version of its F-150 pickup, people familiar with the matter said, which would make the unprofitable truck the U.S.'s first major EV casualty.

The Lightning, once described by Ford as a modern Model T for its importance to the company, fell far short of expectations as U.S. truck buyers skipped the electric version of the top-selling truck. Ford has racked up $13 billion in EV losses since 2023.

Overall EV sales, already falling short of expectations, are expected to plummet in the absence of government support. And big, electric pickups and sport-utility vehicles are the most vulnerable.

"The demand is just not there" for F-150 Lightning and other full-size trucks, said Adam Kraushaar, owner of Lester Glenn Auto Group in New Jersey. He sells Ford, GMC, Chevy and other brands. "We don't order a lot of them because we don't sell them."

No final decision has yet been made, people familiar with the discussions said, but such a move by Ford could be the beginning of the end for big EV trucks.

Using Credit-Card Perks Is Turning Into a Chore

By IMANI MOISE

The real price of a premium credit card isn't the three-digit annual fee. For some, it's the hours spent in spreadsheets trying to get their money's worth.

Eric and Charlene May have an arsenal of 14 credit cards for which they pay about $2,600 in annual fees. To make sure they come out ahead, they diligently update a color-coded Google Sheet as they redeem the cards' dining, travel and shopping credits.

On a recent trip to New York City, they splurged on an omakase dinner and logged it in their spreadsheet on the subway ride back to their hotel.

"Sometimes it can be a bit of a buzzkill," said Eric May, a 36-year-old in Columbus, Ohio, who works at a financial-technology company.

Premium cards are pitched as keys to a world of luxury, with airport lounges, exclusive shopping credits and personal concierges. Most U.S. consumers pay more in credit-card interest than they get in rewards. But for the few who try to take advantage of everything they are entitled to, the cards can feel more like a part-time job than a lifestyle upgrade.

That job has been getting harder lately. To justify raising the annual fees on premium cards, banks have been packing them with additional perks. But instead of juicing
