New Canada Leader Pins Hopes On Being Antithesis of Trump

Ex-central banker endorses multilateral order that president seeks to overturn

By VIPAL MONGA
AND PAUL VIEIRA

OTTAWA—Mark Carney represents a lot of the things President Trump and his supporters dislike. He is a card-carrying member of the global technocratic elite, and he has led two central banks—Britain's and Canada's. He is a regular at Davos, where the World Economic Forum meets, and has been heavily involved in tackling climate change.

He is also, as of Sunday, the new leader of Canada's governing Liberal Party and is expected to be sworn in as the country's leader in the coming days. Political analysts expect him to call new elections that will test whether Trump's drive to rip down and rebuild the world's economic order will gain traction north of the border, too.

"The stakes are high," Carney told Liberal Party members in Ottawa on Sunday. He has wasted little time responding to Trump, whose threats to hit Canadian goods with tariffs and turn the country into the 51st U.S. state have triggered a sense of crisis.

"We have made this the greatest country in the world, and now our neighbor wants to take us," Carney said. "No way. Impossible."

The province of Ontario, meanwhile, on Monday imposed a 25% surcharge on the electricity it supplies to the U.S., following through on Premier Doug Ford's threat to retaliate against tariffs Trump announced last week.

Carney built his blowout leadership win—he received support of about 86% of the ruling Liberal Party's members—with assurances he would use his economic and business experience and relationships with global leaders to mitigate the impact of Trump's agenda.

While Trump is the billionaire heir to a New York real-estate fortune, Carney, 59 years old, is the son of schoolteachers from the town of Fort Smith in Canada's subarctic. He studied economics at Harvard and Oxford, and worked in London, Tokyo, New York and Toronto as an investment

#MeToo Champion Allred Pressured Clients to Settle

Lawyer's feminist-crusader image clashes with moves in private, where women say they're pushed to settle sex-abuse claims

By KHADEEJA SAFDAR

Gloria Allred invited the media to join a video call in March 2021 to hear one of her clients, Efrosina Angelova, share allegations of sexual and physical abuse against actor Armie Hammer.

Angelova cried as she read her statement describing a 2017 incident in which she accused the Hollywood star of raping her when she was 20 years old, slamming her against a wall and beating her feet. She said she "thought that he was going to kill me."

After the press conference, Allred gave interviews about the case where she burnished her brand as a champion of women. A month later, Angelova told her famous lawyer she was suffering panic attacks.

"Get a hold of yourself," Allred said, in a recording of the call. "How old are you? Get a hold of yourself." The lawyer reminded Angelova she was giving her "tough love" and that she wasn't paying her $1,200 hourly fee.

Allred's lifelong crusade against sexual misconduct, representing women accusing Jeffrey Epstein, Bill Cosby, Harvey Weinstein, R. Kelly, Sean Combs and others of misdeeds, has made her a leading figure in the #MeToo movement. Even at age 83, Allred, along with her former law school classmates Michael Maroko and Nathan Goldberg, runs the go-to law firm for women's rights cases in the U.S. Some women turn to Allred before they call the police.

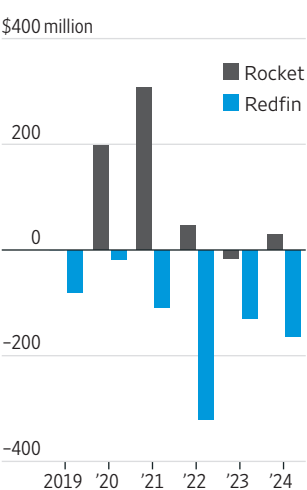

For decades, Allred has hugged and com-

In Ukraine, Russia Trots Out Its Newest Weapons: Horses

The most humble of battlefield companions is proving its value in a high-tech war

By ALISTAIR MACDONALD AND IEVGENIYA SIVORKA

DRUZHKIVKA, Ukraine—On the eastern front here, Russia is saddling up a mainstay of battlefields from earlier centuries to counter Ukraine's drone army: horses and donkeys.

The hoofed mammals carry supplies and soldiers to avoid the attention of drones, which can easily spot and strike armored and other vehicles moving near the front lines.

While horses and donkeys are far from a centerpiece of Russian operations, Moscow's dalliance is indicative of the ways in which a high-tech war is requiring creative uses of old-school combat methods, from trenches to motorbikes.

The technological advances that have made drones highly effective weapons have forced each side to rush to adapt. Some solutions have involved working on advanced equipment such as lasers or electronic jammers aimed at downing the craft. Others have
