

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23, 2026

Healey offers a break on utility bills

15% cut on electric charges for 2 months; other moves would give temporary relief

By Matt Stout
GLOBE STAFF

Facing calls to tackle the state's surging utility costs, Governor Maura Healey on Thursday said the state will cut electric bills by as much as 15 percent over the next two months by repurposing some $180 million it collects from utilities and electricity suppliers.

The announcement, included in her annual State of the Commonwealth speech Thursday night, serves as an unofficial campaign table-setter ahead of the Democrat's reelection bid this fall.

Residents will also see other temporary reductions, including another 10 percent off both electric and gas bills, her office said, although utilities will be allowed to recoup those 10 percent breaks later in the year.

The measures, however, were almost immediately cast by critics as a gimmick that would do nothing to address rising utility costs in the long run.

Healey's office described the move as "rate reductions" for customers of five major utilities —

In State of the Commonwealth address, Healey vows to bring stability. A8.

ELECTRIC, Page A8

With closure near, Time Out Market gets a reprieve

By Janelle Nanos
GLOBE STAFF

The clock is no longer running out on Time Out Market.

Longtime local real estate developer Samuels and Associates announced Thursday an agreement to take over management of the Fenway food hall, just a day before it was set to close. Citing sagging foot traffic and rising costs, operator Time Out Market had announced last week that it intended to close the massive venue in the 401 Park building on Friday.

Now, instead, Samuels will enter a partnership with Alexandria Real Estate Equities, which owns 401 Park, to manage the 27,000-square-foot venue, allowing the mix of 15 vendors to stay open. Samuels will license the Time Out name from the brand, Steve Samuels told the Globe on Thursday, meaning the market's signage and name will stay the same.

"It's a critical piece of the neighborhood," said Samuels, who acknowledged that market conditions have changed since the food hall opened in 2019. But, he added, "we all felt that with a little creativity and hard work, that this is definitely worth saving."

Samuels said that he was moved by the overwhelming response to the news of Time Out's closing, and that Mayor Michelle Wu reached out soon after the announcement, encouraging him

TIME OUT MARKET, Page A8

Leader of homeless program quits amid discord

Faced internal anger over recent layoffs as nonprofit braces for Medicaid cuts

By Chris Serres
GLOBE STAFF

The top executive of the Boston Health Care for the Homeless Program, the city's largest homeless services provider, has resigned amid mounting internal dissent over staff layoffs and complaints that the nonprofit was drifting from its mission to serve vulnerable people living on the streets.

Stan McLaren, a longtime community health leader from Dorchester who was hired as chief executive officer of the program a year ago, abruptly resigned in mid-December, according to an email sent to staff members and shared with the Globe. McLaren was replaced on an interim basis by Dr. Denise De Las Nueces, an internal medicine physician who joined the homeless program in 2012 and serves as its chief medical officer.

McLaren did not respond to multiple calls for comment, and leaders of the program declined to discuss details of his departure.

McLaren's exit came months after the nonprofit carried out the first layoffs in its 40-year history — a decision that drew widespread opposition from clinicians and others inside the organization, according to four current and former staff who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of retribution. His resignation also signals rising strain within the nonprofit as it braces for massive cuts to Medicaid, the government insurance program for the poor that funds most of its services.

While the reasons for his departure remain unclear, employees said McLaren's lack of clinical experience and top-down management style occasionally put him at odds

MCLAREN, Page A6

CRAIG F. WALKER/GLOBE STAFF

A banner on Congress Street in Portland, Maine, expresses the sentiments of many in the state as the ICE operation goes on.

Maine officials get no answers on ICE

'Mass deportation effort' quiet about number of arrests and who's been targeted

By Giulia McDonnell Nieto del Rio, Sabrina Shankman, and Lea Skene
GLOBE STAFF

LEWISTON, Maine — Officials across Maine took a public stand against the Trump administration on Thursday, denouncing its enforcement tactics as Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents carry out a sweeping immigration operation in the state.

"In America, we don't believe in secret arrests or secret police," Governor Janet Mills said at a press conference.

"Why Maine? Why now? What were the orders that came from above? Who's giving the orders?" Mills said, adding that the Trump administration had not returned her calls about immigration operations in her state. "We've asked questions. We have no answers."

Mills and others from Lewiston to Portland expressed a common frustration that they and other public leaders across the country are contending with as the administration remains steadfast in its determination to carry out its immigration agenda.

Department of Homeland Security officials have maintained they are targeting the "worst of the worst," undocumented immigrants with criminal histories.

But some elected officials said the arrests seemed almost indiscriminate, whisking away immigrants with no criminal background.

"I'm tired of people saying the worst of the worst," Senator Angus King said at Portland's City Hall. "Let's call this what it is — this is a large-scale mass deportation effort."

King said he's largely in the dark about what ICE is planning, how many arrests have been made, and who is being targeted.

Homeland Security is calling the surge "Operation Catch of the Day." Officials have provided few details about the number of people arrested or their charges.

In a press release this week, the department gave the names of four people who had been in recent days in Maine, and had previous arrests or convictions, such as aggravated assault, operating under the influence, and drug-related charges. They were from Angola, Guatemala, Sudan, and Ethiopia.

Earlier this week, officials said that about 50

MAINE, Page A6

Long johns, shiver

Friday: Windy and colder. High 30-35. Low 3-8.

Saturday: Brutal but sunny. High 12-17. Low 4-9.

Sunrise: 7:06 Sunset: 4:46

Weather and Comics, G6-7.

VOL. 309, NO. 23

Suggested retail price
$4.00

Greenland discussions have focused on sovereign US bases and blocking adversaries from mining minerals. A3.

The husband of Lindsay Clancy is suing her psychiatrist and medical providers, alleging they overprescribed drugs and failed to monitor her deteriorating mental health. B1.

A ballot measure seeking to repeal recreational marijuana sales in Massachusetts will proceed to the House after a challenge to the petition was struck down. B5.

The physical conditions make Denver a tough place to play, and the Patriots have never won a playoff game there. C1.

The Oscar nominations are out, and it's a big moment for "Sinners," which broke the record with 16 nominations. G1.

Revitalized technical college takes center stage

High-tech building gives Roxbury a boost

By Diti Kohli
GLOBE STAFF

In the South End, the old Franklin Cummings Institute of Technology campus was a mish-mash of red lockers, aging equipment, and sepia-toned paintings of the Founding Fathers in a lobby so large that voices echoed.

The new building — just over 1 mile away in Roxbury and open for barely a week now — is anything but.

Massive skylights and modern laboratories visible from the street make the campus shinier, spiffier, and more "high-tech" than what the vocational college — launched over a century ago out of the estate of Benjamin Franklin — has long been, and more than what this corner of town typically sees.

JONATHAN WIGGS/GLOBE STAFF

FCT, Page A7

Donations fueled the new Franklin Cummings Institute of Technology.