

Workers to be sent back to S. Korea

Deal with U.S. to release more than 300 nationals detained in worksite raid

BY ANNABELLE TIMSIT, MICHELLE YE HEE LEE AND DOUGLAS MACMILLAN

South Korean workers who were detained in a large-scale immigration raid at a Hyundai factory in Georgia will be released and flown home as part of a deal with the United States, the country's presidential office said Sunday.

The agreement comes just days after Korean officials said that more than 300 of the country's nationals were detained Thursday by U.S. law enforcement agents during the largest worksite enforcement operation so far in President Donald Trump's second term.

The workers will be flown to South Korea around Wednesday, according to a South Korean national news agency. The White House did not respond to requests for comment.

The agreement comes at a delicate time for relations between Washington and Seoul, an important U.S. ally. The country's leaders held cordial talks at the White House last month, amid strained negotiations over tariffs and after Trump threatened on social media before the meeting that the U.S. might stop doing business with the country.

The electric-vehicle battery plant under construction in Georgia — a joint venture between Hyundai and LG Energy Solution, which is part of the broader LG Group — represents a significant

SEE SOUTH KOREA ON A9

Off to a good start

JOHN McDONNELL/FOR THE WASHINGTON POST

Zach Ertz, right, scored the game's first touchdown for the Commanders in their 21-6, season-opening victory over the New York Giants at Northwest Stadium, then joined fellow tight end John Bates in a celebratory leap.

Washington's newcomers, including Deebo Samuel Sr., played outsize roles in the win. Story, C1

Russian strikes batter Kyiv

AERIAL ASSAULT IS LARGEST OF WAR

Main government building set ablaze

BY SIOBHÁN O'GRADY AND SERHIY MORGUNOV

KYIV — Russia unleashed its largest-ever air assault on Ukraine early Sunday, sending more than 800 drones and 13 missiles into the country in an hours-long attack that set the main government building in Kyiv ablaze for the first time during the war. A Russian drone also struck a residential building in the capital, killing at least three people, including a mother and her infant son. At least 20 other people were wounded in Kyiv, officials said.

The morning attack sent residents running to bomb shelters as plumes of smoke rose over the city center. The assault marked the largest number of Russian drones sent into Ukraine in a single day and continued a worrying trend of increased Russian attacks on the center of the capital, following another major strike on Kyiv last week.

"Such killings now, when real diplomacy could already have begun, are a deliberate crime and an attempt to prolong the war," Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky wrote on Telegram. "It has been said more than once in Washington that sanctions will follow for refusing to talk. We

SEE UKRAINE ON A14

ICE to reopen prisons that were beset by rioting, abuse

Advocates say doing so would put immigrant detainees at risk

BY DOUGLAS MACMILLAN AND MARIANNE LEVINE

The Trump administration plans to reopen several former prisons and detention centers that were closed by the federal government years ago over concerns about violence, medical neglect and systemic understaffing, as part of the president's plan to carry out the largest deportation campaign in U.S. history.

Three of the facilities, in Texas, Kansas and Georgia, are on a government list of detention centers that U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement plans to reopen or expand by the end of this year, according to an internal planning document obtained by The Washington Post. All three would be operated by the companies that ran them previously.

Congress has approved $45 billion to expand immigrant detention over the next four years. Meanwhile, the Trump administration has stripped away over-

SEE ICE ON A7

DEMETRIUS FREEMAN/THE WASHINGTON POST

Bernadette Reese-Hobson, 63, in the living room of her Philadelphia home, which is desperately in need of repair from water damage. "I don't think my self-esteem as a homeowner can go any lower."

Aging homes are crumbling across U.S.

More Americans are living in unsafe housing that tests their finances — and their self-esteem

BY TIM CRAIG

PHILADELPHIA — Even as her pre-World War II-era house falls apart around her, Bernadette Reese-Hobson tries not to feel "like a failure of a homeowner." Her home is still her refuge, giving her space to sip tea while staring at family photographs that line the walls.

But there is a trash-can-size hole in her living room ceiling, caused by water that continually drips on piles of dank plaster and crumbled wooden beams on the floor. A gaping hole in her basement water heater spills even more water onto her belongings. And when Reese-Hobson steps into her shower, she fears she could fall through the wobbly floor because the pipes underneath her are corroded.

"I've tried to keep up the home and pay bills, and I just couldn't keep up," said Reese-Hobson, 63, a retired social worker and day care attendant who now lives off a $1,400-a-month Social Security payment. "It became one thing after another, and it's been like a domino effect in this house."

Across the nation, and especially here in Philadelphia, homeowners are increasingly struggling to maintain and repair aging homes that are withering, crumbling, and forcing homeowners to exist in almost unlivable conditions.

SEE HOUSING ON A8

GMU president keeps head high as conservatives target him and his school

BY DAN ROSENZWEIG-ZIFF AND KARINA ELWOOD

Most presidents of universities targeted by the Trump administration have kept their heads down. Not Gregory Washington.

When the Trump administration announced the first of four civil rights probes into George Mason University in July, the president of Virginia's largest four-year public university sent a campuswide letter defending the school's efforts to combat antisemitism. He would later send similar letters about its diversity, equity and inclusion programs.

An engineer by training, Washington is a planner by nature. When he became George Mason's first Black president — the latest of many barriers he has broken — he vowed to faculty to overcommunicate. So he couldn't stay silent when the allegations of civil rights violations came. "I don't run from the hard issues," Washington said in an interview. "I run to them. I don't ask people to agree with me, just to enter a dialogue with me."

Washington

In interviews, 17 current and former colleagues of Washington, including deans, professors, vice presidents and four past board chairs, described the 59-year-old as methodical, intensely prepared, principled and at times aggressive. Two criticized him for prioritizing diversity too much, alleging that he pushed faculty to consider race in hiring.

Washington says his vision is shaped by his experience as a

Black man in a field where he rarely saw others who looked like him, especially as he rose in the ranks of academia, and he has since supported policies aimed at expanding access. "Talent is distributed evenly," he said, "but opportunity is not."

He has become one of few public university presidents to openly stand up to the Trump

SEE GMU ON A10

BUSINESS NEWS.....	A15
CAROLYN HAX.....	B2
CLASSIFIEDS.....	C15

COMICS.....	B4
METRO.....	C11
OBITUARIES.....	C14

OPINION PAGES.....	A16
SPORTS.....	C1
STYLE.....	B1

TELEVISION.....	B6
WEATHER.....	C18
WORLD.....	A12

CONTENT © 2025
The Washington Post / Year 148, No. 54333

Intelligence HEALTH BRIEF

Forward-looking, exclusive analysis to stay up to date on health policy news. Sign up at wapo.st/brief or scan this code.