Supreme Court strikes down Trump's tariffs

6-3 ruling; uncertainty remains as he vows to use other methods

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Friday invalidated a large swath of President Trump's sweeping and often-chaotic tariffs in a ruling that struck at the controversial centerpiece of his second-term economic and diplomatic strategy.

The eagerly awaited decision creates a whole new round of questions for US businesses that have to pay tariffs on imported goods. And the uncertainty hits just as the federal government reported a significant slowdown in economic growth at the end of 2025.

The court did not address potential refunds for the tens of billions of dollars in tariffs that importers have sent to the US Treasury since last year. And an angry Trump promised Friday that he would impose a new 10 percent tariff on global imports under a different law that allows the levies to be in place for only five months unless they are approved by Congress.

Still, that 10 percent level is lower than many of the tariffs that were struck down. And about 45 percent of Trump's tariffs remain in place because they were not enacted using the legal authority the Supreme Court invalidated.

"I wouldn't call this a total time to celebrate . . . it's a very difficult issue," said Jon Hurst, president of the Retailers Association of Massachusetts. "We have folks in our membership that very much wanted to see more fairness for locally sourced goods and more manufacturing jobs coming back into the US."

Tony Post, chief executive at shoe company Topo Athletic in Framingham, experienced a rollercoaster of emotions as he followed the news on Friday.

"I think the Supreme Court did the right thing," Post said. "Then an TARIFFS, Page A6

PAWTUCKET, R.I. — It was supposed to be a special night. "Senior Night" was a coming together of the local hockey community to celebrate the outgoing upperclassmen.

Inside Dennis M. Lynch Arena on Monday, there were proud families. Flowers for moms. Handshakes and hugs for coaches. Gifts for the senior student athletes who were starting a new chapter after this season.

The Blackstone Valley schools co-op hockey team started the game with two quick goals against the Coventry/Johnston co-op team, said Chris Librizzi, head coach of the Blackstone team.

"The kids were very excited and celebrating," Librizzi said. "They were flying high."

And then the joy, the buzz, the energy — it was all shattered.

Librizzi thought he heard a balloon pop loudly.

"No more than two seconds after that, there was a pop, pop, RHODE ISLAND, Page A7

ARTISTS' REFUGE IS GOING TO PIECES

Dispute with Northeastern leaves Black program few options

The cinder-block hulk on Atherton Street in Jamaica Plain isn't much to look at, a crumbling relic of another era in a now-vibrant urban neighborhood. Inside the building's drab walls, a vital piece of Boston's Black cultural heritage is on the brink.

For nearly half a century, the African American Master Artist Residency Program has been a haven for Black artists in Boston and a generator of independent Black culture. The Institute of Contemporary Art is paying tribute with an exhibition recognizing its enduring impact. But one year short of its 50th anniversary, the program's relationship with its founding partner, Northeastern University, has worsened to the point where the artists are chafing under restrictive conditions. And at a time when they should be celebrating, they are instead hunting for a path forward.

Starting in the 1970s, the school gave rent-free space and funding to the program, allowing it to become a dynamic haven of art, performance, education, and commu-

Can brain training make everything OK? Just use your head

Will these people never leave us alone? Researchers have released yet another brain-health study, this one finding that people who played a speed-training video game for a mere 23 hours dramatically reduced their risk of dementia — for up to two decades.

Oh, great! Just what I need. Another simple intervention I'm not doing. Arm day, leg day, and now, frontal lobe day.

Brain health has become the new microbiome, or maybe it's the new protein, or fiber, or strength training, pickleball, breathwork, or longevity, or everything rolled into one hideous ball of self-improvement pressure.

If you're not micro-dosing lithium orotate and your friends are — or if you haven't even heard about the 2025 Harvard Medical School study, albeit in mice, that showed lithium could explain and treat Alzheimer's — good luck to you.

My cognitive-improvement calendar is woefully empty. I'm not playing Sudoku, KenKen or Picross; BRAIN, Page A10
