‘BROADVIEW SIX’ CASE

Depth of fallout in judge’s hands

FEDS WILL REQUEST NEW INDICTMENT IN LORETTO CASE:

Federal prosecutors told a district judge they will present evidence to a new grand jury regarding fraud allegations at a West Side hospital after a former lead prosecutor landed at the center of a “credibility crisis” for her conduct on the “Broadview Six” case. Chicagoland, Page A3

Court to decide how far hearings, investigation into embattled US attorney’s office will extend

By Jason Meisner
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

For weeks, Chicago’s U.S. attorney’s office has tried to tamp down a scandal over alleged misconduct in grand jury sessions by focusing on a single prosecutor who handled the now-defunct “Broadview Six” case against Operation Midway

Blitz protesters.

U.S. Attorney Andrew Boutros has ordered a top-to-bottom review of some 100 criminal investigations handled by Assistant U.S. Attorney Sheri Mecklenburg dating back to 2007. His office already has proactively turned over transcripts and even audio recordings of Mecklenburg’s grand jury sessions in at least a half dozen cases, and outright dismissed charges against some 10 defendants — with more potentially to come.

But no one with working knowledge of the U.S. attorney’s office believes Mecklenburg, a 20-year veteran and loyal line prosecutor with an otherwise good track record, was operating in a vacuum. So the question remains: How far will the damage spread?

An answer could begin to crystallize in the coming weeks, as U.S.

District Judge April Perry decides how much the government should have to pay in legal fees to the Broadview Six defendants, and decides whether to hold hearings on potential sanctions against the U.S. attorney’s office and the appointment of special counsel to determine whether the conduct of prosecutors warrants contempt charges.

Revolutionary soldiers’ cemetery transformed and rededicated for momentous anniversary

By Robert McCoppin
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

On a sweltering summer day, a worker walked through Elk Grove Cemetery, searching the ground. Where he saw a depression, he eased a slender steel pole into the soil, probing. A muffled clunk came up through the dirt — something hard. When unearthed, it turned out to be a headstone from 150 years ago.

That discovery last summer led to restoration workers literally digging up history in the cemetery over the last year, finding about two dozen grave markers that had been buried, broken or grown over. They scrubbed the marble and granite with cleaner to restore its brightness, epoxied together the broken parts, stabilized the foundations, and restored the markers to their rightful places.

It was all part of a transformation of the historic cemetery, which holds two documented soldiers who served in the American Revolutionary War. The cemetery will be rededicated Saturday to help celebrate the 250th anniversary of our nation’s

Venezuelans in Chicago turn grief into action after devastating earthquakes

By Laura Rodríguez Presa
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

When the twin earthquakes ripped through Venezuela’s Caribbean coast last month, José Antonio Corro already feared the worst.

The asylum seeker from La Guaira, the coastal state where the June 24 earthquakes struck with the greatest force, spent hours desperately trying to reach his family from his home in Chicago as reports of collapsed buildings and mounting deaths poured in. When he finally heard back, the news was devastating.

Nearly 20 relatives and friends had been killed.

His mother survived only because she ran from her home moments after the first powerful tremor.

Unable to return to Venezuela, Corro turned his grief into action. Less than a day after the disaster, he called the Illinois Venezuelan Alliance with one question: “How can I help?”

“His hands were tied, and his pain was intense.

The only thing that gave him some sort of comfort was to begin gathering items and money to send to Venezuela. I’ve seen him carrying boxes of donations in tears.”
