

The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 2026

Mistrial might be nearing in Clancy case

Jurors again say they're deadlocked as judge continues to urge them to keep at it

By Shelley Murphy, Lea Skene, and Travis Andersen
GLOBE STAFF

PLYMOUTH — Jurors in Lindsay Clancy's murder trial ended another day of deliberations without reaching a verdict Wednesday, and, for the second consecutive day, alerted the judge they have been unable to reach a unanimous decision. Once again, Plymouth Superior Court Judge William F. Sullivan instructed them to keep trying. They have deliberated for 29½ hours over whether Clancy is not guilty by reason of insanity for killing her three children in 2023, or guilty of murder or manslaughter. They will resume deliberations for the sixth day on Thursday.

The growing possibility of a hung jury leaves the outcome of the high-profile case uncertain. It has already attracted a massive audience and sparked public outrage over gaps in psychiatric care and women's postpartum mental health.

"There is no reason to suppose

►Names of jurors still secret. B1.

that the case will ever be submitted to 12 persons who are more intelligent, more impartial, or more competent to decide it than you are . . . it is your duty to decide this case, if you can do so conscientiously," Sullivan told jurors Wednesday afternoon. He was responding to a note they sent after lunch, indicating they were deadlocked.

He read instructions known as the Tuey-Rodriguez charge, and commonly referred to as a "dynamite charge," aimed at urging jurors to avoid a mistrial by listening to contrary opinions and following instructions on the law.

In the event of a mistrial, prosecutors would have to decide whether to retry Clancy.

Jurors appeared tired but serious when they filed into the courtroom after lunch; their expressions

CLANCY, Page A10

Markey's win reflects progressive dominance

With 2028 race looming, Democrats shift left

By Samantha J. Gross and Sam Brodey
GLOBE STAFF

The most enduring impact of Senator Ed Markey's massive primary win Tuesday may not be that he was more progressive than his rival.

It's that Markey, at 80 years old, is now cruising toward reelection as one of the most self-styled progressive Senate candidates anywhere in the country, an embodiment of the shift by Democratic voters to the left ahead of another presidential primary cycle in which progressive candidates are hoping to gain significant traction.

There was Markey's emphatic, repeated promise to pass Medicare for All — not "universal health care," as his challenger Representative Seth Moulton wanted, but the progressive-approved name brand — and his equally emphatic calls to abolish US Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Not just that, but Markey went conspicuously further than fellow Democrats on other issues, including in his proud support for impeaching President Trump a third time — a prospect that Moulton, and top Democratic congressional leaders, have downplayed.

Most notably, Markey leaned into the issue of transgender rights more than perhaps any other high-profile Democrat running this year. Of course, Moulton's controversial comments about trans youth in sports after the 2024 election became a weakness Markey regularly exploited. But

SENATE, Page A7

'It's obvious from the past year that Democratic voters don't think things are going well or that Trump is the only problem.'

DAN GELDON, a longtime top adviser to Senator Elizabeth Warren

While Minogue focuses on Healey, she runs on Trump

By Chris Van Buskirk
GLOBE STAFF

FALL RIVER — Fresh from their primary coronations, Governor Maura Healey and Republican challenger Michael Minogue both said Wednesday that they are running against the failed records of their political opponents this fall.

The thing is, their foils look very different.

After coasting through her Democratic race unopposed on Tuesday, Healey used her first public campaign stop in this South Coast city to again predominantly frame her reelection effort as one countering President Trump.

Minogue, opting to hold no public events the day after a landslide victory in his Republican primary, cast his first bid for public office as undoing Healey's "failed" first four years as governor.

The dichotomy offered both a taste of what voters can expect in the newly formed general election fight, and, for the candidates, a test of how central Trump remains to the concerns, fears, and desires that animate their choices at the ballot.

During an event outside a veterans' center here

GOVERNOR, Page A7

PAT GREENHOUSE/GLOBE STAFF

Governor Maura Healey and Lieutenant Governor Kim Driscoll met with supporters as the campaign kicked off Wednesday.

UNCOVERING THEIR NAMES FROM A LONG-BURIED PAST

A plan is underway to memorialize Black women put in unmarked graves at cemetery

By Mike Damiano
GLOBE STAFF

At Cedar Grove Cemetery in Dorchester, there are two burial sections side by side for deceased residents of Beacon Hill homes for "aged women": one for elderly white women and one for elderly Black women.

But there is a striking difference between them. For every grave of a white woman, there is a headstone bearing her name. The graves of the Black women are unmarked.

This inequality has persisted for more than 150 years, since the Home for Aged Colored Women began burying its residents at Cedar Grove in 1873. Now, a group of neighbors, former city officials, and nonprofit leaders are trying to fix it.

On Wednesday evening, an art installation was unveiled at the site and the names of the 133 women known to have been buried there were read off during a ceremony. Eventually, the group plans to install permanent memorials with the women's names.

Nearly 100 people filled the pews of the cemetery's chapel, as violinist Adrian Anantawan performed as they arrived for the 5 p.m. ceremony.

"We cannot change the circumstances of the burial, but we can change what happens now," said Diana Lam, president of the Boston Women's Heritage Trail. "We can speak their names, we can honor their lives, we can tell their stories, and we can ensure the future generations know that these women were here."

The project began when Joyce Linehan, a former aide to ex-Boston mayor Martin J. Walsh who lives in Dorchester, walked her dog past the burial site and noticed it was marked only by a stone inscribed with the name of the Home for Aged Colored Women. She wondered who was buried there and started asking questions.

Linehan's friend Karilyn Crockett, also a former city official and a professor at MIT,

CEMETERY, Page A10

Tompkins found not guilty of corruption charges

Plans to resume duties as sheriff

By Danny McDonald
GLOBE STAFF

In an extraordinary turn, a well-known Boston politician emerged smiling at the end of his trial on federal corruption charges, as a jury acquitted Suffolk Sheriff Steven W. Tompkins of two counts of extortion on Wednesday, concluding a closely watched case centering on the Democrat's dealings with a cannabis company.

Federal prosecutors alleged Tompkins used his position as sheriff to strongarm Ascend Wellness Holdings for money twice — once for early access to purchase $50,000 worth of stock in the company and later to get his money back after the stock value tanked.

But the case represented a swing-and-miss for the US attorney in Massachusetts, which has successfully prosecuted multiple local politicians and law enforcement officials alike. After deliberating for 3½ hours on Wednesday, the jury rejected the prosecutors' claims and found Tompkins not guilty on both counts.

A relieved and emotional Tompkins patted one of his defense attorneys on the back before embracing some of his supporters in the courtroom after the verdicts.

"I'm feeling jubilant, man," said Tompkins, 69, outside the courthouse in the Seaport after the proceedings.

TOMPKINS, Page A6

Flash mob

Thursday: Thunderstorms. High 76-81. Low 65-70.

Friday: Sunny, less humid. High 82-87. Low 61-66.

High tide: 4:05 a.m., 4:22 p.m.
Sunrise: 6:11 Sunset: 7:15

Weather and Comics, D5-6.

VOL. 310, NO. 65

*

Suggested retail price
$4.00

More than 1,300 workers at Encore Boston Harbor in Everett said they will walk off the job Friday morning if they don't reach a new agreement with the casino. D1.

A federal judge temporarily blocked much of President Trump's latest effort to withhold citizenship from babies born in the United States to noncitizen parents, ruling that the Supreme Court had already settled the issue. A2.

Iran fired on US allies in the Gulf following a night of American bombardment that Iranian state media said included a deadly strike on a wedding party. A3.

The Red Sox continued their recent slide with another display of bad pitching in an 8-3 loss to the Mariners. C1.