Now that tug of war between local and federal officials, unfolding in a Boston courtroom, could set the tone for how similar cases play out under the new Trump administration.

As President Trump plans to ramp up the deportation of unauthorized immigrants accused of serious crimes, Hernandez Rodas’s case provides a snapshot of the legal conflicts among prosecutors,

Israel expands West Bank campaign

Thousands of Palestinians displaced; tanks deployed

By Isabel Kershner
NEW YORK TIMES
JERUSALEM — Israel announced Sunday it was expanding its weekslong military operation against armed Palestinian groups in the occupied West Bank and had deployed tanks in the territory’s north for the first time in two decades.
Adding to the escalating tensions, Israeli Defense Minister Israel Katz said that tens of thousands of Palestinian residents who have left the centers of militancy targeted by the Israeli operation and are displaced within the West Bank will not be allowed to return to their homes.
The moves came as Israel and Hamas accused each other of violating the already fragile Gaza Strip cease-fire deal after Israel delayed the release of hundreds of Palestinian prisoners who were supposed to be exchanged for hostages.

Democrats caught between backers’ wrath, Trump’s blitz

By Tal Kopan

WASHINGTON — Democrats have spent all-nighters on the Senate floor railing against President Trump’s nominees. They’ve protested at government agencies to highlight his slash-and-burn approach. They’ve opposed his actions in court, in some cases temporarily blocking his policies.
But not only has it done little to slow Trump’s momentum, the largely symbolic response has also failed to appease the one constituency they cannot afford to lose: their own voters.
With complete Republican control of Washington, Democrats have been mostly powerless to stop Trump from pushing through a suite of executive actions and getting his nominees confirmed. Meanwhile, left-leaning constituents have been overwhelming congressional phone lines, beseeching their lawmakers at town halls, and engaging

Ambulances rush patients out of town

Closing of hospital forces Ayer paramedics to take long journeys to ERs

AYER — Ambulance 2 was heading out of town again.
The job at hand for the local paramedic crew was transporting their shaken-up patient quickly and safely to the emergency room at Emerson Hospital in Concord, more than 16 miles down Route 2.
But on this chilly afternoon, five months after Nashoba Valley Medical Center closed its doors, paramedics were also calculating whether they’d have time to return to their base at the Ayer Fire Department before rush hour clogged traffic — delaying their response to the next person in need.
It wasn’t lost on the crew that, in the past, the patient on a stretcher in the back of their

To drive a boat, state says, you’ll need a license

Mass. no longer an outlier in water safety matters

On a cold May night in 2010, two young men with scant boating experience left a pier in Kingston on a small boat with a secondhand motor bought for short money. They were planning to cruise around to Plymouth Harbor when the boat was suddenly swamped by a wave.
At 11:22 p.m., just before the boat sank, the men made a mayday call. Hours later, the Coast Guard found Wayne Carlson, the 20-
